And provided further, That none of said appropriation shall be paid to said Kiowas or Comanches till said tribes shall arrest and deliver Satanta and Big Tree to the governor of Texas.

The question being taken on the amendment, there were ayes 41, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I offer the following amendment:

Add to the paragraph these words:

Provided, That the several appropriations herein made for teachers, millers, blacksmiths, carpenters, physicians, and other persons, and for various articles provided for by treaty stipulations, may be diverted to other uses for the benefit of the various Indian tribes, within the discretion of the President, and with the consent of the said tribes, expressed in the usual manner; and that he cause report to be made to Congress at its next session thereafter of his action under this provision.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that he wait, before offering this proviso, until we get nearer through with the bill, so that it may have a wider application.

Mr. BECK. I will state the reason why I wish this proviso put in here, and perhaps after I have made that statement I may withdraw the amendment for the present. This is one of those so-called treaties which is not a treaty and cannot be a treaty, and which Congress ought not to appropriate any money to carry out.

I read to-day from the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of last year, General Walker, and from the report of the Commissioner of this year, Mr. Smith; both of these gentlemen showing conclusively that these Kiowas, Comanches, and Apaches were not only making war upon the people of Texas, but that they were defying the authority of the United States, and each of them calling upon Congress to take such steps as may be necessary to punish them for their violation of law. And yet in the face of the reports of these Commissioners this House is called upon to appropriate large sums of money for carpenters, blacksmiths, millers, engineers, physicians, and teachers.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky offer an amendment?

Mr. BECK. I offer the proviso which has been read. I may withdraw it, but I am speaking to it now. This a fair specimen, and perhaps the best that we can find, of enormous sums of money being expended every year under the pretense of carrying out treaties. This House has refused time and again, even in the absence of the information we now have from the commissioners, to recognize these treaties. The House even went so far on one occasion as to put a gross sum into the hands of the President rather than recognize them. They are in no sense treaties. They originated under an act of Congress which required report to be made to Congress, and no gentleman here will say that that report ever was made to Congress in accordance with the act. And now we are called upon to appropriate the money of the people, when we know there are neither millers, engineers, blacksmiths, farmers, nor any other of these persons who are provided for. Sir, I am willing to give those Indians who are peaceable all the money that the committee propose to appropriate; but I want to put it into the hands of the President to use for their benefit, and not to have it squandered in employing supernumeraries who have no connection with the tribes and cannot reach them or do them any good.

Now, that is the reason why I want this proviso put in this bill. It is not that I wish to deprive these people of any right they may have to the money; but I want the money to be used in a proper way. If, however, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations thinks it better that we should put in a general provision at the end of the bill, requiring a detailed account of what is done with the money and showing us what is necessary and what is not necessary, I am willing to defer the amendment until then. What I want is to get clear of the binding effect of the so-called treaties. If any gentleman thinks this is a treaty that ought to be carried out, I want him to give his reasons for it. Sir, I do not think it is.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman that he withdraw his amendment until we get near to the end of the bill. I think that a provision like this might be safely made.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I do not think there will be any objection to the amendment.

Mr. BECK. Very well; I will withdraw it for the present.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARAPAHOES, CHEYENNES, APACHES, KIOWAS, COMANCHES, AND WICHITAS.

For subsistence of the Arapahoe, Cheyenne, Apache, Kiowa, Comanche, and Wichita Indians, (and transportation of the same,) who have been collected upon the reservations set apart for their use and occupation, $200,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall be expended only on behalf of those Indians who go and remain upon said reservations and refrain from hostilities.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to amend that paragraph by inserting after the words "two hundred" the word "fifty," so as to increase the appropriation to $250,000.

The estimate of the department was for $300,000. We cut it down somewhat hastily, and I am satisfied that these Indians cannot be subsisted on less than $250,000. I presume there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. STORM. I hope the gentleman will explain the necessity for it.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I think that every gentleman, and especially the gentleman from Texas, will agree with me that there is no part of our whole Indian service of so much importance as this. These are the most dangerous of our Indians, except the wild Sioux. We keep them on the reservations, and tell them that if they go off of them we will shoot them down. The soldiers have a right to shoot them down if they leave their reservations. Now, we must feed them; we cannot imprison men and then starve them to death. There are twelve thousand five hundred of these wild Indians.

Mr. SPEER. What was the appropriation for them last year?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Last year they used $300,000, and the estimate this year was for $300,000. We cut it down to $200,000, and we are satisfied now that $250,000 is little enough.

Mr. HANCOCK. I will merely add to what has been said by the gentleman from Iowa, that there are estimated to be twelve thousand five hundred Indians in these associated bands. The amount appropriated, if the amendment shall be adopted, will be only $250,000 for the purpose of feeding and providing for that number of Indians. That would be less than twenty dollars a head. I thought myself that the amount ought not to be less than the estimate, $300,000. The committee in the first place cut it down to $200,000, but they subsequently agreed to increase the amount to $250,000, in which I concur.

The question was taken on the amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 53, noes 4; no quorum voting.

Mr. STORM. I call for tellers.

Mr. GARFIELD. You can have a vote on the amendment in the House.

Mr. STORM. I insist on a quorum here.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. STORM and Mr. LOUGHRIDGE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 26; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. Is a further count insisted upon?

Mr. STORM. I insist on it. I object to voting away $50,000 without a quorum.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Well, if the gentleman insists upon it there is nothing for us to do but to rise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest that the amendment be withdrawn, with the understanding that it will be offered again in the House or that by unanimous consent it be passed over for the present, and voted on at some other time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. STORM. I object.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll; after which

Mr. DAWES took the chair as Speaker pro tempore, and Mr. POLAND reported that the Committee of the Whole having had under consideration the Indian appropriation bill, found itself without a quorum; the roll was called, and one hundred and twenty-one members, not a quorum, answered to their names, and the list of absentees were reported by him to the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask that the list of absentees be called.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. I desire to state that Mr. LAMAR is absent on account of illness.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to allow the list of absentees to be called.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I have no objection to that, and will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I have been requested by Mr. WADDELL to state that he is absent by reason of sickness.

Mr. SPEER. I renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; upon a division, ayes 28, noes not counted.

On the call of the roll, the following members failed to respond to their names:

Messrs. Albert, Archer, Arthur, Atkins, Barnum, Barry, Bass, Berry, Bland, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Benjamin F. Butler, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Crooke, Crossland, Crutchfield, Darrall, Davis, De Witt, Duell, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Farwell, Freeman, Gooch, Hagans, Hamilton, Harmer, Hathorn, Havens, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hereford, Herndon, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Holman, Hooper, Hoskins, Houghton, Howe, Hunter, Hunton, Hynes, Jewett, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Lamar, Lamison, Lamport, Lansing, Leach, Lewis, Lofland, Lowndes, Magee, Maynard, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougal, McJunkin, McLean, McNulta, Mellish, Mitchell, Monroe, Moore, Neal, Negley, Nesmith, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, Orth, Packard, Hosea W. Parker, Parsons, Pelham, Perry, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Potter, Pratt, Rainey, Randall, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Read, Richmond, Robbins, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, Rusk, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Sessions, Sheats, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Sloss, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, William A. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Stanard, Standiford, Stevens, St. John, Stowell, Strawbridge, Swann, Sypher, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Christopher Y. Thomas, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Tyner, Waddell, Wallace, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, White, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Wilber, George Willard, Willie, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—164.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Upon this call one hundred and twenty-six members have answered to their names; not a quorum.

Mr. HALE, of New York. My colleague, Mr. WHEELER, has been present this evening, but was compelled to leave the Hall on account of illness.

Mr. GARFIELD. In view of the fact that from one hundred and sixty to one hundred and seventy members are absent, I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BLAND: The petition of citizens of Missouri, for a post-route from Hartville, Wright County, Missouri, to Salem, Fulton County, Arkansas, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BROMBERG: The memorial of the Board of Trade of Mobile, Alabama, in favor of extending Government aid to the Texas Pacific Railway, to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. CHIPMAN: The petition of James Selden, of Newburgh, New York, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CURTIS: The petitions of citizens of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Saint Louis, Chicago, Cincinnati, Covington, Louisville, and Pittsburgh, for the passage of a law authorizing and requiring the Secretary of the Treasury, in the manufacture of future Government issues, to conform to the plan recommended by the Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment, March 3, 1869, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. DEWITT: The petition of the Second Methodist Episcopal church of Kingston, Ulster County, New York, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WOOD: The petition of bankers, merchants, and others, of Boston, New York, Chicago, Saint Louis, Cincinnati, Covington, Louisville, and Pittsburgh, for the passage of a law authorizing and requiring the Secretary of the Treasury, in the manufacture of future Government issues, to conform to the plan recommended by the Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment, March 3, 1869, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 2, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I rise to a question of privilege and ask the indulgence of the House——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the question of privilege.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I rise to a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. For how long?

Mr. LUTTRELL. Not to exceed from three to five minutes.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I object.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that objection.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I will not.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I have been misrepresented, and I ask the indulgence of the House to make a personal explanation. I have endeavored to treat every member of the House courteously, and only ask, in justice to myself and the constituents I represent, that I may be heard a moment.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I cannot withdraw my objection.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Then I take this occasion to say, the man who perpetrated the article in a morning paper is the author of a base falsehood, and I am responsible for this assertion.

SURVEYS OF PUBLIC LANDS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In pursuance of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th instant, requesting to be informed "what geographical and geological surveys under different Departments and branches of the Government are operating in the same and contiguous areas of territory west of the Mississippi River, and whether it be not practicable to consolidate them under one Department or to define the geographical limits to be embraced by each," I have the honor to transmit herewith the views of the officers of the War and Interior Departments on the subjects named in the said resolution, and invite attention thereto.

Where surveys are made with the view of sectionizing the public lands, preparatory to opening them for settlement or entry, there is no question but such surveys, and all work connected therewith, should be under the direct control of the Interior Department, or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, subject to the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior. But, where the object is to complete the map of the country; to determine the geographical, astronomical, geodetic, topographic, hydrographic, meteorological, geological, and mineralogical features of the country; in other words, to collect full information of the unexplored or but partially known portions of the country—it seems to me a matter of no importance as to which Department of the Government should have control of the work. The conditions which should control this subject are, in my judgment, first, which Department is prepared to do the work best; second, which can do it the most expeditiously and economically.

As the country to be explored is occupied in great part by uncivilized Indians, all parties engaged in the work at hand must be supplied with escorts from the Army, thus placing a large portion of the expense upon the War Department; and as the Engineer Corps of the Army is composed of scientific gentlemen, educated and practiced for just the kind of work to be done, and as they are under pay whether employed in this work or not, it would seem that the second condition named would be more fully complied with by employing them to do the work. There is but little doubt that they will accomplish it as promptly and as well, and much more economically.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, April 30, 1874.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DUNNELL. It should go to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no care about the matter, but it involves appropriations.

Mr. DUNNELL. The subject has been under the control of the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CLYMER. What is it?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is a matter relative to surveys.

Mr. CLYMER. That ought to go to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not care where it goes.

The SPEAKER. It had better go first to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Accordingly the message, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SANTA FÉ LAND CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on the Santa Fé City land claim, being private land claim No. 88; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES A. LUKE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in relation to the bill (H. R. No. 1340) for the relief of Charles A. Luke; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BIDS FOR INDIAN SUPPLIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draught of a bill for regulating bids for Indian goods, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

HENRY HARTSOUTH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 9, 1872, the claim of Henry Hartsouth; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

INDIANS IN UTAH, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draught of a bill providing for certain Indians in Utah, Nevada, California, Idaho, and Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SURVEY OF THE COLORADO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Professor Powell's report on the survey of the Colorado of the West; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LOUISIANA CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House additional testimony in the contested-election case of Lawrence vs. Sypher, from the first district of Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Elections.

WILLIAM H. WARD.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty minutes after twelve o'clock; and the House resumes the consideration of the bill reported some days since from the Committee on Patents, being a bill (H. R. No. 3018) to enable William H. Ward, of Auburn, in the State of New York, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of letters-patent for a shell-molding machine.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That William H. Ward, of Auburn, in the State of New York, have leave to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of the letters-patent granted to him on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1857, for a machine for molding shells, for the term of seven years, from and after the expiration of the original term of fourteen years for which said letters-patent were granted, such application to be made in the same manner and to have the same effect as if the same had been filed not less than ninety days before the expiration of the aforesaid original term of said patent. And upon such application so filed the Commissioner of Patents shall be authorized to consider and determine the same in the same manner, upon giving the same notice, and with the same effect as if the application had been duly filed within the time prescribed by law, and as if the original term of said patent had not expired: Provided, That no person shall be held liable for the infringement of said patent, if extended, for making use of said invention since the expiration of the original term of said patent, and prior to the date of its extension.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I call for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the report of the Committee on Patents, as published in House proceedings of April 17.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I ask that this bill be now put on its passage.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have followed the reading of this report, and, as it seems to me, this bill will fail to do justice to the patentee if he suffered as claimed in the report. I know it has been the practice—it was the practice during the war—for the Government to take patents for improvements in arms and war materials and use them wherever it thought necessary, because with its strong arm it had the power to do so. But this patent, if extended, will, it seems to me, be of no earthly use to this man.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. He is content with it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Nobody will make use of this patent for the manufacture of shells except the Government, unless somebody has gone into the business since the expiration of the patent. The suggestion I wished to make is, that if the statements embraced in the report are correct this man ought to present his claim to Congress for compensation for the use of his patent by the Government, or authority ought to be given to him to prosecute his claim against the Government in the Court of Claims.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. He already has his claim before the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. KELLOGG. It seems to me that that is just the kind of relief which ought to be granted to this man, and that his patent ought not to be extended; for it is a patent for which there will never be any competition except for Government use in time of war. I do not wish to antagonize the bill; but as the patent is one which must be used, if at all, by the Government almost exclusively, I think the Government ought to make compensation to this man for such use instead of granting him an extension. I do not think it right for the Government to take the patents of individual citizens without compensation because it has the power in time of war.

One word further. I do not see any reason why this patentee did not apply for an extension of his patent at the proper time.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I will explain that.

Mr. KELLOGG. There seems to be no reason given in the report of the committee. There is one other suggestion I wish to make. The bill ought to contain a proviso protecting any party who may be already engaged in the business of manufacturing the articles which were covered by this patent. If there is any party who, since the patent has been thrown open to public use, has expended money for machinery and gone into the business of manufacturing the articles which have been covered by this patent, there ought to be in the bill a clause excepting such party from the operation of the bill; and it has been the uniform practice for some Committees on Patents to insert such a provision in their bills to my knowledge. When a patent has once expired, and it has been thrown open to the public, I hold that if a party in good faith invests money in machinery and tools to engage in the manufacture of the patented article, he ought to be protected in his investment in any extension that may be thereafter granted.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. In answer to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] permit me to say that the reason this patentee did not make his application for an extension to the Commissioner of Patents under the law was because he was assured by the Government up to the time of the expiration of the patent, and subsequently, that he should be fully reimbursed. Relying upon that assurance he neglected to make the application as he had the privilege to do under the law—relying, as I have said, on the assurances of the authorities of the Government that it would reimburse him.

Mr. DAWES. He did not make any mistake then, but was persuaded not to insist upon his claim.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Now, Mr. Speaker, he was persuaded not to do that by the authorities at the War and Navy Departments, they telling him he should be reimbursed. The time has expired and they now turn round and say to him he has no title to the patent because his patent has expired, and they refuse to pay him.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will the gentleman yield the floor to me for a few minutes for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I will yield to hear the amendment read.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I desire to offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, Any extension of such patent shall not preclude the United States from making or using said machine or shell, or subject them to any claim of the patentee or his assigns for such making or use during the time covered by said extension.

Mr. HALE, of New York. If the gentleman will permit me I will say a word or two. While I fully agree whatever rights this patentee has against the United States for the use in the past should be fully protected and he should have his standing in the Court of Claims or elsewhere, I think when he comes here asking the favor of a further extension we ought not to grant it against the Government, prohibiting it from using or making the machine and holding it liable to payment for that use during the term for which we grant the extension.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, it will be perceived by every gentleman on this floor that the Government is the principal consumer. I think it would be unjust to allow that amendment to come in, because it would give the Government almost the exclusive right to use this invention of this applicant without paying him a cent for it. That is not right. The Government would thereby be permitted to take advantage of its own wrong.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman from New Hampshire will permit me to say a word in that regard. It is well known that the British government never grant patents to operate against the government. Their patents always reserve governmental use. I believe it would be an eminently desirable thing if the same rule should prevail with us, leaving also with the Government, in case of a beneficial invention and the Government making use of it, to make compensation by way of gratuity but not precluding its use by the Government. Now, whatever rights the patentee has had under the general law for fourteen years I certainly do not desire to deprive him of. I know nothing of the invention.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. He has had no right under it.

Mr. HALE, of New York. During the fourteen years it is said the Government has mainly used it, and that the patentee has a suit pending in the Court of Claims to recover for that use. I would not lay one straw in his way in the enforcement of his just rights against the Government for the use during that time, but when he comes to Congress and asks as a favor, a gratuity, to get an extension of his patent, I think we ought not to grant that extension without distinctly providing such extension shall not be made the basis of a new claim against the Government.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. This claimant is not asking this as a favor but as an act of justice. If the amendment of the gentleman from New York prevails it will really deprive him of any substantial benefit. The Government being the principal consumer, the principal party which will use the invention, if that amendment prevails it will substantially permit the Government to come in here and take advantage of its own wrong. Having given this applicant assurance from time to time that he would be fully rewarded for the use of his invention, we should by adopting that amendment thereby permit them to take advantage of their own wrong, and would deprive this patentee of any consideration whatever for the use of his invention. I will now yield to the chairman of the Committee on Patents. I wish to say again, however, that I do not admit the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I shall then have to ask the House to vote down the demand for the previous question to enable me to offer the amendment.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan, chairman of the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from New York claims, it would seem, that the Government has the right to reserve to itself the use of this patent without compensation, as I understand its effect.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I distinctly stated to the contrary.

Mr. CONGER. At least the effect of it will be to reserve to the Government the use of this patent without remuneration. He said that the British government reserved such governmental use.

Mr. HALE, of New York. But I also acknowledged that was not the law with us.

Mr. CONGER. In England the granting of patents has always been by favor. It is a part of the prerogative of royalty and is the grant of a favor. No man has a right to it there, under their theory of patent-rights. No man has a right to it, but receives the grant only as a favor from the Crown. But in this country every inventor has a constitutional right to his patent.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I would ask the gentleman on what clause of the Constitution that constitutional right is based.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the gentleman must have read the Constitution in his early days.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I have; and I have entirely failed to discover the clause to which the gentleman from Michigan refers.

Mr. CONGER. I might read the Constitution all through in proof of my statement. But it says expressly:

The Congress shall have power to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

Mr. HALE, of New York. That is the clause, is it? I never knew it had got the construction which the gentleman puts upon it. That is his own.

Mr. CONGER. We all learn, sometimes even from humble sources, something new. Now, then, what I say is that in this land, under our Constitution and under the laws of the land, every inventor has the right to the exclusive use of his invention. That is his constitutional privilege against the Government and against everybody else.

Mr. NEGLEY. "The exclusive right." That is the language of the Constitution.

Mr. CONGER. He has a right to the exclusive use, or an exclusive right to the use, which is the same thing. Now the argument of my friend from New York, [Mr. HALE,] based on the analogy of English law and English customs, fails here, because the right of the inventor here is a right to the exclusive use against the Government and against everybody.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a constitutional question right here?

Mr. CONGER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The clause to which the gentleman refers is in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, providing the power which Congress shall have. It says, "the Congress shall have power" to do so and so; for instance—

To borrow money on the credit of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman need not read the whole Constitution.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Does the gentleman maintain that, under that constitutional provision, it is the duty of Congress always to borrow money, any more than it is the duty of Congress to grant patents?

Mr. CONGER. The money question has had a very wide range in this House, and I do not propose to bring it in here. The gentleman cannot coax me to go into the currency question on this patent business.

I wish to add just this in reference to a question which the House ought to decide here. The only value of this invention may be in the Government use of it. The proof before the committee was that it had been of great value to the Government during the last war—of very great value, such as could not be repaid to this patentee in any manner. He has never received from the Government one particle of reward for his invention. He is entitled to a patent for it against the world if he is entitled to one at all. It is a false position assumed here that a constitutional right giving a citizen exclusive right of use of his invention may be taken by any power for any purpose away from him.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Will the gentleman allow me a question? Does this gentleman claim compensation for the past? If so, that might be a consideration in the determination of this question of extension.

Mr. CONGER. He does; but he wishes a patent for the future.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Would he then claim compensation for the future use of the invention by the Government?

Mr. CONGER. That is a matter to be arranged between the Government and the patentee, as in the case of other inventors.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. He says that the Government has used his invention in the past and he claims compensation for that. Now, if his patent be extended will he then claim compensation for the future, if the Government shall use it in the future?

Mr. CONGER. He would be entitled to such compensation if the Government used it for the future. But he has never received a cent of benefit from the Government for an invention that was costly to him, and which by the reports of the officers of the Army and the Navy has been of considerable benefit to the United States. He ought to have an extension of his patent, and he ought to have it without the amendment which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] offers. Our committee have reported this, as is our custom in such matters, after a very full and careful examination, and we feel a disposition not to report in favor of any of these extensions unless there are very sufficient reasons for them.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Of course the claim of this gentleman for a patent is now a matter of grace and not of legal right; and is it not perfectly proper for Congress to attach such conditions to that act of grace as they may choose?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. If they are just.

Mr. GARFIELD. And may not Congress choose to say, we will extend this to you on condition that no claim shall be made against us for the future, though we give you your full rights for the past?

Mr. CONGER. I contend that there is no matter of grace about the extension of a patent. If it is not right to extend it, Congress violates its own duty in extending it. The reason for the extension in all cases in the eye of the law is that the invention is valuable and that the inventor has not received compensation for it from the public or the Government, and that he ought to receive something. Now, this is one of those cases—eminently so.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him if he is not in error in his idea as to the law in relation to the extension of patents? I understand that the law has not been changed, and that the Commissioner still has a right to grant an extension for seven years, but that this man has failed to apply for such extension within the time prescribed by law.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman is mistaken as to the law. Under the old law, prior to 1861, patents were allowed to run seven years, then seven years more by extension, and then seven years more by extension—in all twenty-one years; but under the existing law they can only run seventeen years, and there is no right to extend a patent beyond seventeen years which issued since 1861.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The gentleman is greatly mistaken in the law or I am.

Mr. CONGER. Yes; one of us is mistaken.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I understand that the law gives a man a patent for fourteen years and then gives him a right of extension by the Commissioner for seven years more.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman is mistaken about that; as the law of 1861 and the revision of 1870 and the supplemental act of 1871——

Mr. HALE, of New York. I understand the object of this bill to be to remove an obstacle existing under the general law which allows applications for extension of patents. It is an act of grace on the part of Congress to remove that obstacle and nothing more.

Mr. EAMES. If the gentleman from New Hampshire will yield to me for a minute, I desire to say a word upon this question. I have examined into this case with some care, and I will venture to say here before the House that so far as this application is concerned, or so far as any other report that can be made from the Committee on Patents is concerned, the House need have no apprehension whatever that the committee will recommend an extension in any case that is not deserving of its favorable consideration.

This applicant, Mr. Ward, for a period of some fourteen years before he made application for a patent, from 1841 to 1856, expended his time, gave his labor, and expended money to the amount of something like $30,000 in order to perfect this invention. Prior to this invention shells were molded by hand, as everybody knows. The invention of Mr. Ward was a machine by means of which molds are prepared which make more uniform shells and shells that may be thrown with greater precision. Just prior to the time of his making his application for a patent he entered into a contract with the War Department for the purpose of building one of his machines, for which he was to receive $7,500. The evidence in this case shows that he has received nothing except some $300, which amount was paid to him under circumstances where it was almost necessary that he should have it to keep him from starving. Immediately on the making of that contract he made an application or filed a caveat in the Patent Office, and upon that application he was granted letters-patent for a period of fourteen years, which expired in 1871. During this period, embracing the whole period of the war from 1861 to 1865, the Government had the use of this patent, and it was simply and solely because it was represented to him by the War Department that he should receive a reasonable remuneration for the invention and for the benefit which the Government had derived from his patent during the war that he omitted to make application for an extension of his patent, or rather let the time slip by within which he might have made that application. There can be no question that if he had made his application within the period prescribed by law the Commissioner would have granted him an extension of his patent, and it would have been in existence at the present time.

The question before the House is simply this: whether, when Mr. Ward failed to make his application for an extension of his patent solely because of the representations made by the Government that he should be paid for his invention, Congress will deny him liberty to go before the Commissioner and make application for the extension now for a period of seven years further.

This is one of those inventions, Mr. Speaker, which is simply for public use, and which is useful only in time of war; but it is not, as has been stated on this floor, limited in its use to this Government, because if this patent shall be extended for the period of seven years further, it may be that the inventor may be enabled to introduce his invention into other countries.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I would ask the gentleman whether the inventor has already received compensation for the use of his invention abroad?

Mr. EAMES. Not to my knowledge; but the gentleman who has charge of the bill can answer that question more definitely than I can. I repeat that this case has received a full, thorough, and careful examination on the part of the Committee on Patents, and this bill has their unanimous approval. I hope it will meet with the approbation of the House, and that it will pass.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. GOOCH.]

Mr. GOOCH. This matter has been before the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the facts there developed agree in the main with the facts stated by the gentlemen who have spoken upon this question, but not in all their details. I understand that in 1857 or 1858 Mr. Ward made this invention and obtained his patent. He manufactured one of his machines, after making arrangements with the Government that they would have it put into the navy-yard and have it tested. They took that machine into the navy-yard, and as they claimed tested it there, and paid him on account of the machine a small sum, perhaps $300.

Now, I understand that there is a conflict between Mr. Ward and some of the officers of the Navy Department. He contends that shells have been made upon substantially the same principle covered by his patent. They deny that such is the fact. They say that his machine has been laid aside, and has not been used, and was not used during the war. On the other hand, he contends that although they did not use his machine in the manufacture of the shells which they made, they adopted some of the principles which his patent covered.

It stands in just this position before the Committee on Naval Affairs, if I may be allowed to refer to a matter pending in committee. Mr. Ward says that he is willing to manufacture a given number of shells by his machine; that the Government may manufacture a given number of shells by any process known to it. He will then pass his shells over to the Government officers, and they may make the test. If his shell is not found to be superior in every respect to any shell which can be manufactured by any other process, then he will withdraw all claim for compensation for any use which may have been made of his machine or of the principles covered by his patent in the manufacture of shells by the Government during all the past. It seems to me that it is advisable the Government should make this experiment; and I trust the Secretary of the Navy will feel authorized to have the test made. If this machine has the merit which is claimed for it, then the inventor is entitled to a fair compensation. If patents are to be extended at all, certainly the amendment which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] has offered to this bill should not be adopted. If this patent is used, it will be used for the manufacture of shells.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. By the Government?

Mr. GOOCH. And the presumption is that the Government will manufacture its own shells, and use all the instrumentalities within its power to aid and assist in that manufacture. If the Government does that, then it is simply saying to this man, no matter how much of value you may have in that invention, or how much of benefit the Government may derive from it, Congress, in extending your patent, says to you that you are to receive no compensation whatever from the Government. And it will be claimed hereafter, when this man shall come before one of the Departments, or even before Congress itself where he is ultimately obliged to come unless the Department chooses to make a contract with him, that he had accepted the renewal of his patent on the express condition that he should have no compensation from the Government for its use.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I have been trying to find out what compensation this gentleman has received abroad, and nobody seems to know.

Mr. GOOCH. I understand that at one time he was in the Woolwich arsenal, I think; they were manufacturing shells, and he suggested to them a process by which they could improve their shell. I do not think he introduced then and there his present patent, but he suggested to them a mode of manufacturing shell, which mode covered one of the principles embraced in his patent.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Was that before or after he introduced his invention in this country?

Mr. GOOCH. I cannot say whether it was before or after. I understand that he made to them a suggestion in which they considered there was so much of value that of their own accord they made him a compensation of £1,000. But I do not understand that he then and there introduced his patent or his machine for the manufacture of shells. I understand that he merely made a suggestion; and if I recollect aright it was prior to our late war that the suggestion was made; and they made him this voluntary compensation because they thought the suggestion had so much of value in it. I do not understand that he has attempted to introduce his shell abroad in any other way than as I have stated; but on this point I am not fully informed. If I am correctly informed, prior to the war he undertook certain business contracts abroad, which kept him there during the whole period of our war, and I think until after the time his patent had expired.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I desire to say a single word. The object of this legislation is not to grant to this man an arbitrary patent, but simply to permit him to go before the Commissioner of Patents and there make application for an extension. In other words, it is simply to put this man in the same situation that he was in at the time of the expiration of the original term of fourteen years. Gentlemen will bear in mind this fact; he would then have made his application to the Commissioner of Patents if he had not relied upon the assurances of the officers of the War and Navy Departments.

It is claimed by certain gentlemen that this man should not be rewarded twice; that if he gets his claim allowed before some of these committees, he will be fully paid, for his patent will be fully reimbursed. If he had not relied upon the assurances of the War and Navy Departments this patent would doubtless have been extended by the Commissioner of Patents and would have run for seven years more. The patentee, however, confided in the assurances of those Departments to the effect that he need not trouble himself about going to the Commissioner of Patents, but that he would be fully reimbursed. Yet, so soon as the time expired within which he could make application for an extension, they turned round and said to him, "You have no title to your patent."

Mr. BURCHARD. Was it the promise that he should be reimbursed for the past use of his patent?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Yes, sir; that he should be reimbursed for the use of it in the past. That was the assurance made to him. If he had not relied upon such assurances, he would have gone before the Commissioner of Patents, as he had the right to do under the law, and his patent would have been extended. The present law gives the patentee seventeen years as the term of his patent, thereby establishing that term as the policy of the Government. This man has had only fourteen years; and but for the assurances of the Department, would doubtless have obtained an extension under the law.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. As I understand, the allegations made on behalf of this man are denied by the Navy Department.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I do not so understand. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, which is embodied in the report, may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 14, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to reply to your letter of the 5th instant, in reference to the machine furnished by Mr. W. H. Ward, of Auburn, New York, that the machine was furnished to the Department and used for the service of the Government; that it is of present use and value to the service, and that no payment has been made Mr. Ward for the same.

Very respectfully,

GEO. M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. C. D. MACDOUGALL,
House of Representatives.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

Mr. BURCHARD. Mr. Speaker, the argument used in favor of extending this patent is that the inventor has not been compensated for his invention during the period that it has been used by the Government. The appeal is strong, I think, in favor of compensating him if the invention is valuable and if the Government has not paid for the use of it. But if this patent is to be extended I do not wish to see this man rewarded by a claim upon the Government for the future as well as the past. I think that if this bill be passed, giving him an extension of his patent from this time, there should be a proviso that he waives his claim for compensation for the use of the invention by the Government in the past. I wish to offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. That would give to this patentee the use of his patent for only seven years. It would be saying to him "you ought to have no compensation for your patent except for the term of seven years." That would be unjust.

Mr. BURCHARD. The argument that this man has a claim which has not been paid, a claim which he can now press, a claim in which there is perhaps equity and justice as well as legal force, is, it seems to me, no ground whatever for extending this any more than any other patent. I am opposed to extending patents unless in special cases where some equity is shown entitling the party to such extension.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Why, sir, the equities are all with this man. He has not received a cent from the Government, although he has expended something like $30,000. Gentlemen will bear in mind that the Government has received the benefit of this invention during the war. As attested by the letter of the Secretary of the Navy just read, the invention was of great use to the Government during the war, and is now.

I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MYERS.]

Mr. MYERS. This patentee, as my colleague on the Naval Committee has stated, was before that committee, and we know something of his invention. I say this to the House to allay any misapprehension that may exist. This is not an application for an extension of a patent. Let me make myself understood. In 1861 Congress adopted the policy that patents should be granted for the term of seventeen years and no longer. Before that time the term was fourteen years, with the privilege of obtaining, upon application to the Commissioner of Patents, seven years' extension as a matter of right. This man obtained a patent. It was his right when fourteen years had expired to obtain an extension of seven years' upon proving that he had not been sufficiently compensated. Why was not that extension granted? This man did not give the ninety days' notice of the application for an extension as required by law. This bill is merely to remedy that omission and allow to him the same chance as all other inventors holding patents for similar terms. Why did not this patentee give the ninety days' notice of application for an extension? Because the Government itself prevented him; because the Government which put this invention into use in its navy-yards, and I believe its arsenals, promised him compensation for his invention and his great outlay. But such compensation was never given. Some of the officers said the invention was valueless. The Secretary of the Navy says that it is not valueless. But waiving that question the broad fact stands out that this man, being abroad, confident that the Government would fulfill its promises, failed to take the necessary steps to secure his legal right to an extension. The Government cannot now give him the compensation that should be given to him, and he now asks simply that he may be put upon an equality with every other inventor who held a patent of similar date. It was his legal right to have a seven years' extension; but he comes in here not asking an extension, but merely the privilege of applying to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension, a privilege which other patentees have enjoyed. If the Commissioner of Patents finds that the invention is novel and valuable and that the patentee has not been sufficiently compensated, then an extension will be granted.

Under the present law, patents run for seventeen years. Under the law as it existed a few years ago patents might run twenty-one years at the discretion of the Commissioner of Patents. This man has a valuable invention; he has received scarcely a dollar from it. These inventors with their inventions go to make up the wealth of the country; we boast of them at all times; yet whenever a similar application comes here for the granting of an extension under the law, many members are found who, merely because the word "extension" is used, imagine that we are taking something from the public; that we are interfering with the rights of private parties when we are merely proposing to do justice to a patentee. That is all this bill does, and I hope it will pass. Let me say a word more. The bill maintains all intervening rights, but gives this man the privilege of trying to make something out of his patent.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I rise now to call the previous question before the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope the gentleman from New Hampshire will yield to me to offer my amendment.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I will yield to have the amendment read.

Mr. KELLOGG. I offer it so that private persons may not be injured. I move to add to the proviso the following words:

The Clerk read as follows:

And any person or party having made or purchased machinery for the manufacture or molding of such shells, since the expiration of said letters-patent, shall have the right to use the same during the period of its extension.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. The bill provides that no person shall be held responsible up to the time of the passage of this act. I demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 13.

So (no further count being demanded) the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BURCHARD demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REYNOLDS POWER-LOOM PATENT.

Mr. EAMES, from the Committee on Patents, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1216) for the extension of a patent known as the "Reynolds power-loom patent" with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the reading of the report in that case, so we may know the principle upon which the committee have acted.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope the gentleman will not take up his whole hour in that way.

Mr. CONGER. The report in that case explains the principle upon which the committee have acted. I hope that by unanimous consent it will be printed in the RECORD. If that can be done it will answer my purpose.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The bill was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

[The report is as follows:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of Henry S. Van de Carr, administrator, and Elsie M. Reynolds, administratrix of the estate of Rensselaer Reynolds, deceased, for the extension of a patent issued to the said Rensselaer Reynolds, deceased, submit the following report:

Letters-patent of the United States were granted to the said Rensselaer Reynolds on the 1st day of June, 1852, for an improvement in power-looms, and on the 24th day of May, 1866, the same were extended for a period which expired on the 1st day of June, 1873.

This loom occupied less space, required less motive-power, and ran at greater speed than any loom for weaving plain goods then in operation.

In these respects it was a great improvement, especially by the rapidity of its motion in increasing the number of picks woven from one hundred and twenty to about one hundred and seventy a minute.

Under the patents which have been granted, Mr Reynolds has been protected in the exclusive right to make and use this loom for a period of twenty-one years in his life-time, which included nearly the whole period of the original patent and the extension. Mr. Reynolds used every effort to introduce his loom into general use, and during the greater part of the first term of the patent he did not succeed in realizing a fair remuneration for the benefit which his improvement conferred upon the public; but during the latter part of the original term of fourteen years, and a large portion of the extended term of seven years, he was more successful, and, as appears in evidence, received, over all expenditures and losses, the sum of about $60,000, an average of nearly $3,000 a year for the entire life of the patent.

The committee, while recognizing the invention of Mr. Reynolds as an improvement on the loom then in operation, and one of the best looms now in use, do not think that the facts in evidence present such an exceptional case as would justify them in recommending an application to the Commissioner of Patents for a further extension of his patent; and therefore report adversely to the petition, and recommend that the same do lie upon the table.]

JOHN W. MARSH.

Mr. EAMES, from the Committee on Patents, also reported a bill (H. R. No. 3170) for the relief of John W. Marsh; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Commissioner of Patents, upon due application made to him, is authorized to extend the patent of John W. Marsh, of Oxford, Massachusetts, for a trimming attachment to sewing-machines, issued to him October 27, 1857, and reissued on the 6th day of September, 1859, and numbered in the reissue 809, for the period of seven years from the passage of the act, upon the same evidence and principle as if application had been made to him by said patentee in due time prior to the expiration of said patent, provided no person or corporation shall be made liable for an infringement of said patent, if extended, for having made use of the invention therein patented since the expiration of the original time of the patent and prior to the date of said extension; but such extension, if granted, shall not impair in any manner the rights acquired by contract with said patentee prior to such extension, or of any person or corporation to use said invention.

Mr. EAMES. I ask for the reading of the report. It shows fully the facts and the reasons upon which the recommendation of the committee is based.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of John W. Marsh, of Oxford, county of Worcester, and State of Massachusetts, for the extension of letters-patent granted to him, submit the following report:

Letters-patent of the United States were issued to the said John W. Marsh October 27, 1857, and upon surrender were reissued to him on the 6th day of September, 1859, for a period of fourteen years from the original grant. The invention for which these letters-patent were granted and reissued consists of a trimming attachment connected with the needle-bar of a sewing-machine in such a way as to rise and fall with the movements of the needle, and thus trim the goods sewed at the same time that the seam is made.

This device is no part of the sewing-machine proper, although it is used in combination with it. It is merely an attachment to the sewing-machine, which may be used or not at pleasure. It is not adapted to or required for use in the ordinary family sewing-machine, but, as appears in evidence, is limited to machines employed in manufacturing establishments, and is attached principally to machines which are used in sewing the cloth and light leather entering into the manufacture of ladies and children's fine boots and shoes, although it may be applied to machines used in the manufacture of articles of the lighter class. In the manufacture of these articles, and especially in making fine boots and shoes for ladies and children's wear, it is essential to trim the edge of the seam, and for this purpose, prior to this invention, it was necessary to take the material after it had been sewed, from the machine, and trim it by hand. This required as many hands to trim as it did to sew the goods. By the use of this attachment the trimmer can be dispensed with and the article trimmed in the machine automatically. This improvement, therefore, saves the wages of one workman on every machine used, and thus enables the manufacturer, by the reduction of the cost of the production, to reduce the price of the articles to the purchaser. In this respect the invention is a great benefit alike to the manufacturer and consumer.

It is an invention of marked simplicity, and will be of great value to the public if generally applied to the sewing-machines to which its use is adapted.

It appears from the evidence that the petitioner is a mechanic in humble circumstances; that at the time and since the letters-patent were granted to him he has been dependent upon his daily earnings for the support of himself and his family; that he has made every effort within his limited means to introduce into use his invention, but that his receipts as yet have not been equal to his expenditures. Discouraged by his failure to make his invention remunerative during the original term, and without sufficient means at the expiration of that term to enable him to introduce it if extended, combined with the expense, which he represents he was not able to incur, involved in an application for an extension, the petitioner omitted to apply, as was his right, within the time prescribed by law to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of his patent. He now represents that if the patent is extended he can procure, upon conditions advantageous to himself, the aid of persons of sufficient ability to secure the introduction of his invention into public use and thus derive therefrom a reasonable reward for the benefit which his invention confers on the public.

The committee are satisfied, upon the evidence, that this invention is of great value; that the petitioner has used reasonable diligence in his efforts to introduce the same into public use; that he has not been compensated either for his skill and ingenuity or the time and money which he has expended, and that if his patent is extended he may reasonably expect to be fairly remunerated for the advantage which his invention is to the public. The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. EAMES. This report has received the unanimous approval of the Committee on Patents, and, as I have stated, it embraces all of the facts as well as the reasons on which the committee came to the conclusion they did. And, unless some member desires some further information, I shall call for the previous question.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. How long has this patent already run?

Mr. EAMES. It was issued for a period of fourteen years; and this is an application for an extension for a period of seven years.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I wish to ask the gentleman whether evidence was taken by his committee, or whether any information was before the committee, as to who is the present owner of this patent, and to whom the benefits of this extension, if it is extended, will inure?

Mr. EAMES. I understand that it belongs to the patentee, but that he has made arrangements or is in hopes of making arrangements with somebody of sufficient means, if the patent be extended, to introduce it into use.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Let me pursue my inquiry a little further. No one who has given any attention to the subject of the extension of patents can fail to be aware that in every case of an important invention the application for an extension is ordinarily pressed in this House in the name of the poor inventor, who has received nothing or substantially nothing from his invention. I have observed that it is very apt to turn out that the poor inventor is neither the party who prays for the extension nor the party to whose benefit the extension will inure if it is given.

Now, knowing nothing at all about this matter, but knowing this fact that there is to-day in existence what is known as a combination—a combination of three of the principal sewing-machine companies——

Mr. EAMES. This has nothing to do with that.

Mr. HALE, of New York. A combination of the Grover & Baker, the Singer, and the Wheeler & Wilson companies—in view of the fact that that combination is the proprietor, to a very large extent, of all the sewing-machine patents that have been granted since the original grant to Elias Howe, I want to know from the committee whether this combination, or any other sewing-machine companies, or set of sewing-machine companies, are the owners of the patent and the parties who will be benefited by this extension?

Mr. EAMES. So far as could be ascertained from the evidence before the committee, the patentee is the sole owner of the patent, and has no connection, directly or indirectly, with the companies, or any of them, to which the gentleman from New York has alluded. They have been brought in, in connection with another application pending before the committee, but we have no information that there is any connection whatever between this patentee and them.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Let me ask one more question. I am only in pursuit of information. I assume to know nothing, and know nothing, of this claim. I want to know whether this claim has been pressed before the Committee on Patents by the attorneys of any of the companies I have referred to.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Not at all; not by one of them.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I wish to ask the gentleman from Rhode Island whether this instrument is used except in conjunction with sewing-machines?

Mr. EAMES. It is not.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. It is utterly valueless except in conjunction with a sewing-machine?

Mr. EAMES. It is.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. It is only used in connection with the manufacture of boots and shoes.

Mr. McCRARY. I understand the report of the committee to say that this invention is used by manufacturers and in manufacturing establishments, and that it cannot be used in sewing-machines adapted for family use generally. I wish to know if the gentleman from Rhode Island is entirely certain upon that point. I press the inquiry, because there is no monopoly in this country that needs to be broken up more than the monopoly of sewing-machines, and I hope there will be no extension of any patent that has to do with sewing-machines in use in families.

Mr. EAMES. This is not used in that way. I demand the previous question.

Mr. CROCKER. I had risen before the previous question was called for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island had the right to demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CROCKER] on this question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. CROCKER. I am very sorry to differ from a committee for whom I have so much respect as I have for the gentlemen composing the committee who have reported and advocated this bill. But, Mr. Speaker, I stand on entirely different ground from that on which they place this bill. I say here to the House that if the country has been bled sufficiently by anything, it has been by the sewing-machine companies and their combinations all over the country from one end of it to the other.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. This has nothing to do with family sewing-machines, any more than it has to do with pitch-forks.

Mr. CROCKER. I expect it will turn out that some sewing-machine manufacturers will have the benefit of this.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Not at all. And this is an application from one of your own constituents, too.

Mr. CROCKER. I do not care whether he is my constituent or not. The people in this country are all my constituents, from one end of it to the other. I do not stand up here for any particular set or class of constituents, God knows.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I desire to say a word.

Mr. CROCKER. I decline to be interrupted. I deny the right of other gentlemen to keep interrupting me.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I thought the gentleman had concluded his remarks.

Mr. CROCKER. I am the last man that would deny a fair compensation to any inventor, any man who has brains, anybody who by the use of his brains brings forward something that is of value to the country; but I believe that fourteen years is a sufficiently long term for a patent to run as a rule, and I protest against the constant imposition of renewals of patents upon this country after the term of fourteen years has expired. We hear the same story always, Mr. Speaker, and that is that they have reaped no benefit from their patent. Somebody has reaped benefit from it, and I say it is time for this House and this Congress to put its foot upon this bleeding of the people in the manner in which it is done, and especially in sewing-machines. Allow me to tell you that sewing-machines of all others, with all their combinations and ramifications, have done more to bleed this country, probably, than any other invention we have ever had. I have said all I wish to say.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Every word which has fallen from the lips of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CROCKER] meets my entire approval. When he has gone as far as he desires to go in opposing the extension of patents, he will find the Committee on Patents willing to go a little further.

Mr. CRUTCHFIELD. They have gone further.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. If he only knew the amount of work we have had before us—of course I do not propose to disclose the secrets of the committee—but if he only knew the conservative feeling which prevails in the committee, and the number of schemes for patent extensions that have been throttled there, I do not think he would object to any application that we bring forward to the House. This is the first time, I believe, that the committee have been called for reports, and this is the second application that has been reported on favorably for an extension of patent.

Now, what is this case? This applicant is a poor man, living in Massachusetts, without any means whatever. He never has realized a dollar from this invention. It is a simple, ingenious device, which is attached to a sewing-machine, and that is what makes it obnoxious to the eyes and ears of the gentleman from Massachusetts. It is a little device which is attached to the sewing-machine for the purpose of trimming the seams of boots and shoes. Gentlemen will bear in mind that it has nothing to do with the ordinary family sewing-machine. I have here a specimen of the kind of work which it does, which gentlemen can examine. As the needle sews the seam this knife follows it and trims the seam, thereby saving the labor of one individual and doing the work very perfectly and nicely.

Now, Mr. Speaker, under the present law—and this should be borne in mind—a patent remains for the term of seventeen years. When this individual took out his patent the term was fourteen years, with the privilege of applying to the Commissioner of Patents for an additional term of seven years. This term expired in 1871 or 1872, only a short time ago. The applicant failed to make his application to the Commissioner of Patents simply because he is so poor a man that he could not pay his expenses to Washington for that purpose. He never has realized a cent from his patent; he never has got a dollar from it. He is to-day, as the proof before the committee conclusively shows, the sole owner of it. The proof was full, complete, and explicit that he had made no assignment, transfer, or sale whatever. Now we do say that an application for the extension of a patent for an invention of the value of this invention, and which has never brought any remuneration whatever to the inventor, ought to receive the favorable action of Congress.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I would ask the gentleman why it has not been remunerative heretofore if it is so valuable in itself?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Because this man has been too poor to introduce it. The proof is ample, full, and explicit on that point. This man was not worth more than two or three hundred dollars; the evidence shows that. And he never has been able to introduce his invention because he has not had the pecuniary ability to do it.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Has he any more now?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. He has a little more. The proof shows that he is worth something like $1,500 now, and he thinks he can get a little remuneration for this invention. It is a very meritorious case; and I beg gentlemen to take into consideration the fact that the Committee on Patents is not going to recommend to this House the passage of any act to extend a patent that will be obnoxious to the country. I think we have a proper appreciation of the situation in regard to these matters, and I do not think the House need apprehend that the committee will do any thing of that kind. This bill simply proposes to give this applicant the privilege of going before the Commissioner of Patents and making his application, and if he does not make the application of course the Commissioner of Patents will not extend his patent. It is simply an enabling act, giving him the privilege of going before the Commissioner of Patents. That is all.

Mr. EAMES. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. However invidious it may be to attempt to stop the renewal of a patent of a man from Massachusetts, yet I know a great many thousand poor men and women in Massachusetts who have to wear shoes. I am not now for the makers of shoes at all; they can take care of themselves; but there are a great many poor people that have to wear shoes, and the putting of a patent upon any machine that goes to make up shoes—and most of the shoes of the cheaper class are made by sewing-machines—does not meet my approval.

I by no means mean to antagonize the eloquent gentlemen of the Committee on Patents. I think they have done a very good work this Congress. I have heard of fewer patent cases this session than in any other Congress since I have been here.

It is evident that the feelings of my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. PARKER] have been very much moved in behalf of this patentee, and I am afraid his judgment is a little biased by that sympathy, which is natural.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. He lives in Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have no doubt he does; a great many of these men live in Massachusetts; and if you should give patents to them for all their new ideas, there would be nothing that would not be patented. But I am talking about the poor people who have to wear shoes. This country has been taxed many and many million dollars which have gone into the pockets of these monopolists. I am sorry this poor man should be in a condition not to have realized anything from his invention in fourteen years. But I think it is time that the sewing-machine patents had run out.

Mr. EAMES. This is no part of a sewing-machine.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand it is used on a sewing-machine.

Mr. EAMES. It may be used on a machine or not, at the pleasure of anybody. It is adapted only to certain kinds of machines, those that are used for sewing light leather.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand all that. In 1846 as counsel I drew one of the earliest specifications for a patent for a sewing-machine. All the principal patents have now run out. In order to control the manufacture of sewing-machines all manner of little attachments are got up, so that they may keep up their patents. The original patents, those for a needle with an eye through the point, operating upon the arm of a lever—all patents for that portion of the machine, being the principal part of it—have now run out. But the sewing-machines are covered with little attachments, something here and something there, in order that they may be kept under patents. This is a sewing-machine attachment for the purpose of being used with a given stitch or a given method of using the stitch. It will be made the means of doubling or trebling the price of a machine if it has any merit in it; and if it has not it will do no harm. If it has advantages, then fourteen years is time enough in which the inventor could obtain a sufficient remuneration for the amount of brains expended on this little piece of iron, however much he may have.

However invidious it may seem, still in the interest of the men and women of this country who wear shoes and who will have to pay for this patent if granted, I must oppose it. If it is granted they will have to pay many million dollars, while but a few hundred will go into the pocket of the inventor.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. The evidence before the committee was full upon this point, that this trimmer saved the labor of one person. Manufacturers of boots and shoes gave their testimony to the effect that they could manufacture cheaper by means of this trimmer attached to the sewing-machine than they could otherwise.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is exactly my point.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Then the gentleman does not want these boots and shoes to be cheap.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly I do.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. They will be made cheaper by this machine.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I agree to that; but when you put this patent on a machine, then the people will have to pay for it. If all men can make boots and shoes by the aid of this machine, then they can be made cheaper still; whereas the man who holds the patent, if it is all that it is claimed to be, will hold a monopoly and will get for seven years the benefit of the labor of one man for each and every machine to which his patent is attached. He will get the benefit of that, and the poor people who wear the shoes must pay for it, because we in Massachusetts who are smart enough to invent a thing of this sort are smart enough to put the profits in the right place. But if this manufacture is open to the competition of all the world, then the persons who wear the boots and shoes will get the benefit. The manufacturer who owns this patent, this monopoly, will charge just as much as if he had to make his shoes as heretofore, without the benefit of this invention.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. The manufacturers of Lynn have requested this.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have no doubt of it. I have very great respect for the manufacturers of Lynn, but I am not going to put a monopoly into their hands.

Mr. CONGER. I want to say a word or two on this subject. I am very sorry to be compelled to defend the interest of the poor people of Massachusetts when they have so many able Representatives on this floor. But if it is necessary I will take up the task. What does this invention do; what kind of manufacture is it employed upon? It is used in the making of fine, ornamental, elegant, light-stitched work such as that used by the friends of my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] not that which the poor people of Massachusetts use. If his friends wore the other kind, the kind that did not have this ornament upon it, then his argument might be good. But their feet are not affected either way by this. The proof is conclusive that this is used in the making of ornamental fancy shoes; there is no doubt about it. There is a kind of cutting or trimming along the seam that no man can do with accuracy with any other tool. It is their fancy work this invention is used for, and the rich people pay for it, not the poor people that my friend has talked about.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman suppose that the rich people wear shoes with such work upon them as that, [exhibiting specimen?] They do not in my section of the country. I do not know what they may do in that of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. All who can afford to wear that nice, delicate work will wear it. The poor wear kip-skin and such kind of material.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this poor man from Massachusetts—I wish he had a representative on this floor—this poor man has labored long to make a simple invention which shall reduce the labor upon these fancy shoes and thereby cheapen them, so that persons even in moderate circumstances may be able to buy them. My friend from Massachusetts is afraid that the work shall be made so common and cheap that even people in moderate circumstances can wear nice shoes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want to take off the monopoly; and then they will be cheaper.

Mr. CONGER. It is in proof that this man who invented this simple machine (and all valuable machines are simple) is as poor as he can be; that he has not the means even to bring this simple implement into use; and he asks an extension, which he would have had the right to apply for under the law as it was when he got his patent. But by a recent change of the law we have limited the term of patents to seventeen years and have cut off extensions. On account of his poverty this man could not apply for an extension under the law. This bill will enable him to go before the Commissioner, prove the utility of his machine, and that he never has been remunerated for it under the law. If he succeeds in making such proof he will be entitled to an extension. I desire to reiterate what another member of the Committee on Patents has said, that when the committee shall have finished their labors and shall have reported adversely upon many of the propositions which are before them, which my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and I will alike war against—I venture to say that not one gentleman in this House will condemn our action. If there should be any complaint I will take the blame upon myself.

Mr. EAMES. In reply to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] who says that this invention will make no reduction in the cost of the work, I wish to have read the statement of a gentleman largely engaged in the manufacture of shoes at Lynn, Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not say that the invention does not reduce the cost of the work; I have no doubt that by means of the invention the work can be done much more cheaply; but I say that if we extend this patent the manufacturers will get the benefit of this reduction.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I call for the regular order.

Mr. EAMES. Then I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; under the operation of which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were on a division—ayes 84, noes 43.

Mr. HAZELTON of Wisconsin, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 95, nays 85, not voting 110; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Barrere, Barry, Bell, Biery, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bromberg, Bundy, Burleigh, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cason, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Crutchfield, Darrall, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Durham, Eames, Elliott, Farwell, Frye, Hagans, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Joseph R. Hawley, Hendee, Hooper, Hoskins, Hunton, Hynes, Kelley, Kellogg, Knapp, Lansing, Lawson, Lewis, Lynch, MacDougall, McLean, Negley, Niblack, Niles, O'Neill, Orr, Packard, Hosea W. Ward, Wheeler, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Wilber, George Willard, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wood, and Woodford—110.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. RICE. I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. WARD, is necessarily absent.

Mr. WALLS. My colleague, Mr. PURMAN, is necessarily absent. If here he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. EAMES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MOIETIES.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I desire to make a report, for printing and recommittal, upon a matter with reference to which the Committee on Ways and Means have leave to report at any time; and I wish to ask the Chair whether or not this matter will be open for consideration in the House at any time.

The SPEAKER. Is it in relation to moieties?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. It is.

The SPEAKER. The understanding was that the Committee on Ways and Means might report upon that matter for action at any time in the House.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Is it proposed to bring that question up now?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The proposition is that the report be printed and recommitted. Technically this might exhaust the right of consideration at any time; but that will not be the understanding. The mere reporting for printing and recommitment will not be considered as exhausting the power of the committee to report at any time for consideration in the House.

The bill reported by Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS, being a bill (H. R. No. 3171) to amend the customs-revenue laws and to repeal moieties, was read a first and second time, recommitted, and, with the evidence in the case, ordered to be printed.

UNAUTHORIZED USE OF NAMES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that he has received a letter from Mr. George W. Childs, proprietor of the Philadelphia Ledger, stating that his name was used without any authority whatever, in the list of incorporators in the bill to incorporate the International Immigration and Land Company. The Chair hears no objection, and the name of Mr. Childs will be withdrawn from the list of incorporators, his name having been used without his knowledge or consent.

Mr. SPEER. I should like to know who introduced that bill into the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows nothing about that.

Mr. BURCHARD. I have a similar letter from Willard C. Flagg, of Illinois, that his name also may be withdrawn from the list of corporators in that bill, as his name has been used without his knowledge or consent.

The SPEAKER. It was done evidently without proper consideration in reference to the use of these gentlemen's names.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is it in order to move to strike out all the names of the incorporators of that bill?

Mr. CLYMER. It is quite likely the Committee on the Public Lands will do that very thing.

Mr. MONROE. I have received a letter from General J. D. Cox, of Cincinnati, Ohio, whose name has been used without his knowledge or consent, in this or some similar bill, and I ask that it be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and these names will all be withdrawn. This will operate, having the sanction of the House, on the Committee on the Public Lands as instructions.

MANUFACTURERS OF STEEL.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the following petition of consumers of steel and manufacturers of steel and steel products in various forms to maintain the existing laws to the fullest extent for the protection of the industrial interests, which is one of a large number I have received from various sections of the United States, and also that it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The petition is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, consumers of steel, and manufacturers of steel and steel products in various forms, respectfully memorialize your honorable bodies to maintain to the fullest extent the existing laws for the protection of our common interests. We beg you to consider that the propositions made to change or abolish these laws affect not only our own prosperity, but our very existence in many departments of industry, and also, through us, that general prosperity of the country through which alone the foreign trade itself can be maintained.

A small and exceptional class of steel consumers claim, in a petition already, or soon to be, laid before your honorable bodies, that the natural growth of their business is "greatly hindered by the enormous and excessive tax now levied on steel of foreign manufacture." But these petitioners certainly do not comprehend, neither do they truly represent, the facts of the case, which do not disclose any actual grievance nor any ground for just complaint. On the contrary, the duties collected on all the foreign steel entered into consumption in the United States, and classified within the range of values from below seven to above eleven cents per pound, for the eleven months ended June 30, 1873, embracing the whole period of that fiscal year under the reduced tariff, amounted to an ad valorem of almost exactly 33 per cent.; whereas the aggregate duties collected on all dutiable goods for the fiscal year, averaged ad valorem, were equivalent to 38.07 per cent., showing that the steel specified was subject to 5 per cent. less duty than the general mass of dutied imports. Further, taking the total of steel and manufactures of steel imported during the said eleven months, the average ad valorem rate was 37.11 per cent., and 37.51 per cent. for the whole fiscal year; thus evidencing that steel, classified within the range of values from below seven to above eleven cents per pound, was admitted at some 4 per cent. less than the general average for steel and steel products of all kinds. Nor is this all; for, of the steel classified as stated, the lowest grade paid duty for the eleven months at the rate of 39½ per cent., while the higher grade paid at the rate of 27⅞ per cent., and the highest grade at the rate of 33½ per cent., proving that the most expensive classes of unwrought steel are subjected to lower entry charges than the cheapest class; yet the petitioners named claim to find their grievance in the lower charges. We respectfully submit whether these unquestionable facts sustain, in the smallest degree, the charge that the existing duties are "enormous and excessive."

The aforesaid petitioners, in making their appeal to your honorable bodies, call your attention to "the important position occupied by the manufacturers of agricultural and mechanical implements, consumers of foreign steel in the United States." In return, we would ask your attention to a fact, almost notorious throughout the steel trade, that an insignificant fraction of the steel consumed by the manufacturers of agricultural implements is of foreign make, but that the bulk of quantity is of American production; while of the other classes who consume foreign steel, either in part or in whole, nearly every one who produces largely enjoys a considerable export demand for his products. We would further ask consideration for the fact that these manufacturers, as a class, engross the markets of the United States, to the almost entire exclusion of their European rivals; and that with advanced prices for steel abroad, growing out of increased cost in production, the deductive probabilities are that a lowering of duties and a change in mode of levy, would not cheapen steel to the mass of American consumers even by the sixteenth of a cent per pound.

Moreover, we respectfully represent that the claim of the aforesaid petitioners for reduction of duty does not state the facts correctly on the important point of exporting American manufactures made in part of foreign steel. By the act of June 6, 1872, the privilege of drawback, or of full refund of all duties paid, less 10 per cent., was extended to shovels, spades fire-arms, scales, balances, axes, hammers, hatchets, &c., one-half of the materials of which is imported; and this exemption is fully realized by most New England manufacturers. Indeed, nearly all who manufacture for export have for years received a full refund of all duties paid, upon shovels and axes particularly. To these leading manufacturers steel has been and is practically free of duty, so that their allegation that the export of articles "into which foreign steel enters as a chief component part" is prevented or obstructed by the tariff acts is simply untrue. In actual practice this refund of the duty on such articles is largely and liberally made.

The request made by the aforesaid petitioners that the invoice foreign price paid by bona fide purchasers be recognized as the dutiable value by the appraisers at the United States ports of entry (without regard to the real market value) would be utterly subversive of the principle involved in the present system of levying duties, and would practically result in entering all classes of goods for import (on which ad valorem duties are imposed) at prices less than their true market value.

Finally, the request of the aforesaid petitioners, that "the system of taxation shall be changed from the present assessment ad valorem to a specific rate," should, in the opinion of the undersigned, be disregarded. We are content with the duties as at present levied. With all the imperfections of the existing plan, we, as well as the Government, are likely to be better off than under some new and untried scheme whose results are as yet purely theoretic and partly conjectural. A specific duty, fully divorced from the ad valorem principle, could be adopted only at the expense of American consumers no less than of American producers of steel. Within such a level range of entry charge, production on our soil would find help where it has already won the victory, and encounter re-enforcement of our foreign competitors where the victory is yet partially to be won.

The undersigned are prepared, and, if circumstances really demand, stand ready, to establish by unanswerable proof every statement set forth in this memorial to your honorable bodies. Our request, in its essence, is, that no legislation whatever concerning reduction of duty on any class of steel be attempted during the present session of Congress.

SARDINE GRAHAM STONE, OF ALABAMA.

Mr. BROMBERG, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3172) to relieve Sardine Graham Stone, of Alabama, of political disabilities; which was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that all the political and legal disabilities imposed on Sardine Graham Stone, of Alabama, by provisions of the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution be, and the same are hereby, removed.

The SPEAKER. Is there a petition in this case?

Mr. BROMBERG. There is.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. BROMBERG moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I propose to move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, this being objection day; but before doing that, as the committees have not been called for reports of a private nature for some four weeks, I suggest, by unanimous consent, the committees be called for reports of a private nature for reference only.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the understanding of the House, the Chair will now call over the committees for reports of a private nature for reference only.

JAMES A. M'CULLAH.

Mr. NIBLACK, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3173) for the relief of James A. McCullah, late collector of the fifth district of Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. REED AND OTHERS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the Committee on Claims, reported adversely on the petition of William H. Reed, William Barnes, and others, for compensation for detention of the steamer Belle Peoria; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CHARLES E. BUCK.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, also, from the same committee, reported adversely on the petition of Charles E. Buck; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PARDON WORSLEY.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3174) for the relief of Pardon Worsley; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REIMBURSEMENT OF ADVANCES.

Mr. DUNNELL, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on Claims, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 857) for the relief of Salmon B. Colby, with the recommendation that it do not pass; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. ORTH in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. This being objection day, the committee resumes the consideration of the Private Calendar where it left off on the previous objection day. No debate is in order, and if there be a single objection to any bill it will be passed over and the committee will proceed to the next bill.

HOT SPRINGS, ARKANSAS.

The first bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 608) extending the time for filing suits in the Court of Claims to establish title to the Hot Springs reservation in Arkansas.

Mr. HYNES objected.

JAMES A. DREW AND OTHERS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2873) for the relief of James A. Drew and others.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, objected.

WILLIAM I. BLACKISTONE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 554) for the relief of William I. Blackistone.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to William I. Blackistone, of Saint Mary's County, Maryland, the sum of $972, in full for services as a board of trade, in Saint Mary's County, Maryland, from December 15, 1862, to September 15, 1863.

The report was read, as follows:

Under the authority of an act of Congress, approved July 13, 1861, providing for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes, and of an act supplementary thereto, approved May 20, 1862, preventing the conveyance of arms, munitions of war, and other supplies, to persons in insurrection against the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury established regulations concerning internal and coastwise commercial intercourse, and appointed officers and agents to execute the same.

Under the provisions of paragraph 6 of these regulations, dated August 28, 1862, the claimant was appointed a "board of trade" for the counties of Charles and Saint Mary's, in the State of Maryland. He performed this duty satisfactorily from the 15th December, 1862, to 15th September, 1863, nine months, for which service he received no compensation except the sum of fourteen dollars.

The reason that he was not paid was owing to the fact that he made no application until the fund from which such payments had been made was covered into the Treasury. The new regulation of the Treasury, of September 11, 1863, has changed the service and superseded this agent by the functions of another officer.

The special agent of the Treasury has recognized the claimant's services, and recommends an allowance of four dollars per day, amounting to $972.

The committee are satisfied that he ought to be paid the amount recommended, and therefore report the bill back without amendment, and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

DABNEY WALKER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2890) for the relief of Dabney Walker.

Mr. SPEER objected.

A. G. COLLINS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1272) for the relief of A. G. Collins.

Mr. SPEER objected.

MRS. LOUISA ELDIS, OF SANDUSKY, OHIO.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2891) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa Eldis.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Louisa Eldis, of Sandusky, Ohio, the sum of $691.83, in full compensation for losses sustained by the occupancy of her stone building in Sandusky, Ohio, by the One hundred and third Regiment of New York Volunteers, during the months of January, February, March, and April, 1864.

The report was read, as follows:

That the petitioner is the widow of Martin Eldis, deceased; that the said Martin Eldis owned certain property in the city of Sandusky, Ohio, known as the Saint Lawrence Hotel, or Saint Lawrence block; that said property was taken possession of by the authority of Captains Brooks and Ford, officers and quartermasters of the United States Army, as barracks for the use of troops stationed at and doing duty in said city of Sandusky; that said property was used as barracks from November, 1863, to the latter part of May, 1864; that when so taken the property named was in good condition and commanded a fair rent, but owing to the damages done thereto by said United States troops the building could not be rented, thus necessitating extensive repairs to place it in good order. It appears that the property was damaged by the soldiers, who knocked off the plastering, injured the doors, windows, stairs, &c., and in various other ways injuring and defacing the building, requiring a considerable expenditure to place it in tenantable condition, besides losing the rent of the same for several months. It further appears that when the barracks were vacated, Colonel Charles W. Hill, then commanding United States forces at Sandusky, convened a board of officers for the purpose of ascertaining what rent should be allowed for all buildings and property used by United States troops in Sandusky, and also assessing just damages for any injuries to such property by the troops using the same. It also appears that the board recommended the payment of $350 to the petitioner for rent of, and the sum of $691.83 as damages to, said property; that the Third Auditor of the Treasury, in September, 1865, paid the $350 recommended to be paid for rent, but declined to pay the $691.83 recommended as damages, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction in the matter of damages, which your committee understand is the rule with that office in all cases.

It appears from the statements made and testimony adduced in support of the claim of the petitioner that the amount recommended by the board of officers convened by order of Colonel Hill, is no more than a fair compensation under the circumstances, and the committee therefore report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

THOMAS SIMMS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2892) for the relief of Thomas Simms, late a lieutenant in the Seventy-sixth Regiment New York Volunteers.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of War to cause to be paid to Thomas Simms, late second lieutenant Company G, Seventy-sixth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $590, being the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant for the period of six months, between the 25th day of December, 1862, and the 1st day of May, 1863.

The report was read, as follows:

The testimony shows that Thomas Simms enlisted as a private soldier on the 13th day of September, 1861, in the Seventy-sixth Regiment of New York Volunteers, and was immediately promoted to the place of first sergeant. That he was commissioned on the 13th of May, 1862, by the governor of New York, as second lieutenant, to take rank from the 22d of February, 1862. Then the company was above the minimum number. That from June until in August, 1862, he did the duties of captain in the absence of the captain and first lieutenant of his company. On the 11th day of August, 1862, he took sick, and was sent to hospital on the 20th day of August, 1862, and on the 14th day of January, 1863, he received a furlough for fifty days. He went home, returned at the end of the specified time, being still unfit for duty, and was put in hospital, where he remained till the 4th day of May, 1863, when he was notified that the Secretary of War had discharged him on the 26th of December, 1862. He now wants pay as second lieutenant from the 22d of February, 1862, to May 1, 1862, and from December 25, 1862, to May 4, 1863. His claim for pay for the first period is not sustained by the evidence. It does not appear that he did duty as an officer between the 22d of February and the 1st of May, 1862. He could not and did not, so far as the proof shows, do the duties of second lieutenant regularly till after his commission was issued, May 13, 1862. As a matter of favor he was mustered thirteen days back of that date. It thus appears to be clear that he had no claim for the first-named period.

He was in hospital and kept at the expense of the Government, or on furlough, from December 26, 1862, to May 4, 1863, the date when he received notice of his discharge. His furlough, which was dated January 14, 1863, from hospital, for fifty days, shows that he was recognized and held as an officer in the service. At the end of his time he returned to the hospital in Washington City. From thence he was peremptorily discharged on the 4th of May, 1863; and he was notified that he had been out of service since December 25, 1862, very greatly to his surprise. Being held by the Government until this time, he was justly entitled to pay to the 4th of May, 1863.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

SALT LAKE CEMETERY.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 347) granting a portion of the United States military reservation at Salt Lake City for cemetery purposes.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of War to grant to Daniel S. Tuttle, Warren Hussey, George E. Whitney, Edmund

Wilkes, and Abel W. White, and to their successors, a tract of land in the United States military reservation of Camp Douglas, near said Salt Lake City, not exceeding twenty acres in extent, in such place as they shall select, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, and not to be made so as to interfere with the use and occupation of said reservation for military purposes, to be used as a public cemetery, under such rules and regulations as they shall establish for the protection, care, and management of said cemetery; provided that the cemetery shall be open and free to all without any other charge than what is necessary for care, protection, and embellishment.

The question was on the following substitute, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to set apart a tract of land, not exceeding twenty acres in extent, in the United States military reservation of Camp Douglas, near Salt Lake City, in the Territory of Utah, to be used as a public cemetery, under such rules and regulations as he shall establish for the protection, care, and management of such cemetery. And he shall cause the same to be laid off and platted in convenient and suitable lots, which shall be forever devoted for the purpose of the burial of the dead. And he may set apart forever to each of the religious denominations organized in Salt Lake City which shall file with him proof of their organization, a lot not to exceed one acre in size, and of convenient shape, which such denominations may inclose and ornament as they see fit, to be used for the purposes of burial; and two acres shall be reserved as a potter's field, or common burying-ground, which may be inclosed and ornamented by the authority of the said city.

The substitute was adopted.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

SHERIDAN O. BREMMER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2412) for the relief of Sheridan O. Bremmer, late a private of Company E, Eighteenth Regiment Wisconsin Infantry.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Adjutant-General to remove the charge of desertion against Sheridan O. Bremmer, late a private in Company E, Eighteenth Regiment Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, and grant him an honorable discharge; and the proper accounting officer is hereby authorized to credit and pay all claims for bounty and allowances which he would have been entitled to had no charge of desertion been made against him.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill is reported from the committee with the following amendments:

Strike out "credit" and insert "audit," and add the following proviso:
Provided, That no pay or allowances shall be granted to this soldier for the time he was actually absent from his regiment by virtue of a supposed discharge.

The amendments were agreed to.

The report read was, as follows:

This soldier enlisted on the 30th day of November, 1861, and was mustered in as a private in Company E, Eighteenth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, on the 21st day of January, 1862. He was subsequently taken very ill of pneumonia; and there being no prospect of his recovery when the regiment was about to leave Milwaukee for the field, the surgeon of the regiment gave him a discharge, countersigned by the colonel commanding, and both officers informed him that he was discharged, and to go to his home. His name was dropped from the company-rolls with the statement, "Discharged March 29, 1862, at Milwaukee, Wisconsin." Although sick for a long time he finally recovered, and proposed to re-enlist in the same company, when the recruiting officer saw that he had not a legal discharge. He was thereupon ordered to report to his company, which he promptly did, and his case was reported to division headquarters, when Brevet Major-General J. C. Smith issued an order that he be "restored to duty from desertion without trial, with forfeiture of pay and allowances," &c. His company officers swear that he was never entered on the company-rolls as a deserter, and ought not to have been so considered. Evidently the soldier was not in fault, and should receive full pay, allowances, and bounty, less the time he was actually absent from the regiment.

The committee, therefore, submit an amendment for such limitation proviso, and, as so amended, recommend that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

F. O. WYSE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2893) for the relief of F. O. Wyse, late a lieutenant-colonel, &c.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to place on the list of retired officers of the Army the name of F. O. Wyse, late lieutenant-colonel of the Fourth Regiment United States Artillery, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel; provided that said F. O. Wyse shall be entitled to pay as such lieutenant-colonel only from the date of the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

This officer entered the Army as a second lieutenant in the year 1837; became a captain in 1847; was brevetted a major for gallant services before the enemy in the Mexican war; was made a major, by promotion, in 1861, and a lieutenant-colonel in the same year. In 1862 he resigned under the following circumstances:

In 1859, then serving with his command on the Pacific coast, while returning on horseback from duty as a member of a general court-martial, convened at Fort Steilacoom, Washington Territory, by the fall of his horse he received an injury in his left ancle-joint, which totally disabled him for several months, and from the effects of which he has never recovered. In 1861 and 1862 he performed duty as a mustering officer; but believing himself unable to endure active service, he appeared before a board assembled by direction of the President to retire disabled officers, convened at Washington in July, 1862. The testimony submitted to this retiring board shows that the lameness caused as above stated still existed at that time; that the injury was of such a permanent nature as would prevent marching on foot or riding a long distance, but that a cure had been so far effected as would enable him to do duty as a mounted officer. The board thereupon decided that he was not incapacitated for active service.

Being thus denied the privilege of being put on the retired list, and feeling fully assured that he could not perform more active duty than the light service upon which he was then employed, he felt compelled, although with evident reluctance, to tender his resignation, which was soon afterward accepted. Instead of being cured, his injury has grown continuously worse and has disabled him from work.

Surgeon-General Barnes, who was one of the witnesses before the retiring board, in a letter of October 18, 1869, states, "I have no hesitation in saying that it (the injury) should have entitled you to the benefits of the retired list whenever the results became as grave as they now are."

His disability is, therefore, evidently permanent, and was received by him while acting in obedience to orders. In the opinion of the committee, the retired list was intended to relieve just such necessities as are presented by this case.

This officer has rendered good service to the Government for the best thirty years of his life. His health is now broken, so that he is unable to provide for his family.

His military record is fine, and his fealty to the Government is beyond question. He asks to be placed on the list of retired officers of the Army with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and that he be entitled to pay as such from the date of the acceptance of his resignation.

The committee present a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to place this officer on the retired list, with pay only from the date of the approval of the bill, and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

AMANDA M. SMYTH.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2894) for the relief of Amanda M. Smyth, widow of the late Brevet Major-General Thomas A. Smyth.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, objected.

NATHAN COLE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 379) for the relief of Nathan Cole, late captain Twenty-third Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps.

The bill, which was read, authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to credit Nathan Cole, late captain and brevet major Twenty-third Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps, in the settlement of his accounts with the United States, with the sum of $120.80; the said sum having been collected by him while acting as agent of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, at Lewisville, Arkansas, in 1867, and lost in transmission to the proper receiving and disbursing officer at Little Rock.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ACTING MASTER ROBERT PLATT.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2896) to authorize the appointment of Acting Master Robert Platt as acting lieutenant in the Navy of the United States.

The bill authorizes the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Robert Platt, now acting master in the Navy, acting lieutenant therein, during such period as his services may be required by the Coast Survey.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

GEORGE HENRY PREBLE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2897) authorizing the President to appoint George Henry Preble, now a captain on the active list of the Navy, to be a commodore.

The bill authorizes the President to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint, George Henry Preble, now a captain on the active list of the Navy, to be a commodore on the active list of the Navy, next below Commodore Edward Donalson, being the same relative position on the Navy Register occupied by him for thirty-one years, until the promotions of 1866.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

HENRY C. CAREY.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 259) to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with Henry C. Carey.

The bill authorizes and directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with Henry C. Carey for his services as acting consul of the United States at Elsinore, Denmark, from the 1st of July, 1872, to the time when the consul of the United States took charge of said office, and to allow said Henry C. Carey compensation for said period of time at the rate now allowed by law to a United States consul at said place; provided that any fees collected and appropriated to his use by said Henry C. Carey during said time shall be deducted from the amount paid to him.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

J. AND W. R. WING.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2898) for the relief of J. and W. R. Wing, of New Bedford, Massachusetts.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Messrs. J. and W. R. Wing, agents and managing owners of the late American whaling bark Xantho, of New Bedford, Massachusetts, the sum of $642.22 in gold, in full payment for expenses incurred by them for the support and transportation of the crew of that vessel after its wreck in the Indian Ocean, June 18, 1871.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

HARRIETTE A. WOODRUFF.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2899) granting a pension to Harriette A. Woodruff.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Harriette A. Woodruff, mother of Eugene A. Woodruff, late a first lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Let the report in that case be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2623) granting a pension to Harriette A. Woodruff, mother of Eugene A. Woodruff, late first lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers, having considered the same, make the following report:

It appears from the papers in this case that Eugene A. Woodruff entered the service in 1861, as a member of Company E, Fifth Regiment Iowa Infantry, and after serving a few months was appointed a cadet at West Point. He graduated in 1866 with marked distinction, standing No. 5 in a large class, and at once entered the regular service. In 1873, while superintending the work assigned him on the Red River raft, it became necessary for him to visit Shreveport to procure needed supplies for his working parties. On his arrival at Shreveport he found the city stricken by a sudden and terrible epidemic, before which all but the bravest fled, leaving the sick suffering and to be cared for by the few gallant souls who dared to face the plague. It was a position to call forth all the generous, self-sacrificing impulses of a Christian gentleman and a soldier, and nobly did Woodruff answer to the call. Joining the Howard Association, he took his part in bringing order out of chaos, in inspiring others with his own fearless spirit; working good both at the bedside of the sick and among those who could only be held in the path of duty and charity by a present bright example. After one week of devotion to the care of the plague-stricken, Woodruff was himself seized with the disease, and died from its effects September 30, 1873.

The petitioner claims pension on the ground of dependence, which is abundantly proven by properly attested papers. The claim was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions "because it was not shown that Lieutenant Woodruff was ordered to Shreveport to perform any duty, consequently the disease which caused his death was not considered to have been contracted in the line of duty." Additional evidence on this point proves the contrary to be true. Charles W. Howell, captain in the Corps of Engineers, states under oath that he was well acquainted with Lieutenant Woodruff, and that it was by his order that said Woodruff was stationed at Shreveport, and that while at his post of duty, and in the discharge of duties devolving upon him by competent authority, was attacked by yellow fever, from the effects of which he died.

The committee believe the claim to be a just and proper one, and the mother entitled to pension, and therefore report favorably, and recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute for H. R. No. 2623.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JOSEPHINE D. THOMAS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2900) granting a pension to Josephine D. Thomas.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Josephine Dac Thomas, widow of Evan Thomas, who was killed in the late Modoc war, captain Fourth United States Heavy Artillery, and pay her a pension at the rate of thirty dollars a month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving, from and after the passage of this act.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MARY E. NAYLOR.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 567) granting a pension to Mary E. Naylor, widow of Osborn Naylor, late a private in Company C, Second Kansas Volunteers.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary E. Naylor, widow of Osborn Naylor, late a private in Company C, Second Kansas Militia.

Mr. ATKINS. Let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 567) granting a pension to Mary E. Naylor, widow of Osborn Naylor, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

That we concur in the report of the Senate committee, report back the bill, and recommend its passage.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

EUGENE SMITH.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 540) granting a pension to Eugene Smith.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eugene Smith, late of Company F, First Nebraska Veteran Volunteers.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN HENDRIE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2901) granting a pension to John Hendrie.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Hendrie, late a private in Company B, Seventeenth Regiment of United States Infantry; payment to commence from the passage of this act.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JAMES R. YOUNG.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 470) for the relief of James R. Young.

The bill authorizes and directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow and credit to James R. Young, late postmaster at Lisbon, New Hampshire, the sum of $309.84, for postage-stamps stolen from his safe and office by burglars on the night of May 15, 1869, without any fault or neglect on the part of said postmaster.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

DWIGHT J. M'CANN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2039) for the relief of Dwight J. McCann.

The bill was read.

Mr. GIDDINGS and Mr. SPEER objected.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

MUSEUM OF FINE ARTS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2989) to authorize the trustees of the Massachusetts Museum of Fine Arts to import and retain for two years certain works of art free of duty.

The bill authorizes the trustees of the Museum of Fine Arts, an institution established under the laws of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for the promotion of the fine arts, to import free of duty a collection of pictures belonging to the Duke of Montpensier, and not intended for sale, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe; provided that a bond shall be given for the payment to the United States of such duties as are now imposed by law upon any and all of such pictures as shall not be re-exported within two years after such importation.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JESSE F. MOORE AND CHARLES W. LEWIS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2990) for the relief of Jesse F. Moore and Charles W. Lewis.

The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Jesse F. Moore and Charles W. Lewis, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,041.06 in full pay and satisfaction for a lot of tobacco improperly seized at Macon, Georgia, in November, 1867, from Jesse F. Moore, and sold January 31, 1868, by J. C. McBurney, acting as collector of internal revenue, and the proceeds of which have been covered into the Treasury.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

O. N. FELTON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 977) for the relief of O. N. Felton, late assistant treasurer of the United States at San Francisco, California.

Mr. SPEER objected.

C. E. ROGERS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 207) for the relief of C. E. Rogers.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Postmaster-General in settling the accounts of C. E. Rogers, late postmaster at Carver, Minnesota, to allow him a sum not exceeding $222.50 as indemnification for a like amount belonging to the post-office fund, and stolen from the said C. E. Rogers on the 29th day of October, 1869, in case it shall satisfactorily appear to the Postmaster-General that the said Rogers was guilty of no negligence in the custody of the money and postage-stamps stolen.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

RICHARD DILLON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2991) to reimburse Richard Dillon for subsistence while in the discharge of his official duties in the service of the United States.

Mr. SPEER objected.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3000) for the relief of Samuel W. Davidson, Henry Smith, John Gray Bynum, and others.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, objected.

PETER J. KNAPP.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3001) for the relief of Peter J. Knapp.

The bill directs the Secretary of War to cause Peter J. Knapp, late a private in Company H, Fifth Regiment Iowa Infantry Volunteers, to be honorably discharged and mustered out of the service, to date with the muster-out of his regiment, and to cause to be paid to him the full sum due him for back pay and allowances as a soldier of the company and regiment above named; provided that the Secretary of War shall be satisfied upon investigation that the agreement of the said Peter J. Knapp to join the enemy was made while the said Knapp was incarcerated in a rebel prison, and for the purpose of escaping from imminent peril of death from exposure and hunger and with a view of escaping to the Union lines.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was not agreed to upon a division—ayes 28, noes 39.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I understand that objection has been withdrawn to the bill (H. R. No. 1272) for the relief of A. G. Collins.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Objection is also withdrawn to the bill (H. R. No. 977) for the relief of O. N. Felton.

The CHAIRMAN. It requires unanimous consent to go back to any bill on the Calendar which has been passed by.

Objection was made.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made to going back, the Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to on a division—ayes 56, noes 38.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ORTH reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report sundry bills to the House with a recommendation that they be passed.

PRIVATE BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole, were then severally read the third time, and passed:

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, moved to reconsider the various votes by which private bills had just been passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP.

Mr. E. R. HOAR withdrew the pending motion to reconsider in connection with the bill (H. R. No. 2199) to carry into execution the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution concerning citizenship, and to define certain rights of citizens of the United States in foreign countries and certain duties of diplomatic and consular officers, and for other purposes.

MESSENGER FOR COMMITTEE.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask unanimous consent to submit and have adopted at this time the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Accounts be, and is hereby, instructed to audit and allow the account for the services of the messenger for the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, without regard to the fact that the said messenger did not take the required oath at the commencement of such service, and that the amount so allowed shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. HOSKINS. I object.

A. G. COLLINS.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. Objection was made in Committee of the Whole to House bill No. 1272, for the relief of A. G. Collins. I understand that objection is now withdrawn.

Mr. SPEER. I made the objection in Committee of the Whole. But upon explanation made to me by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I renew the objection.

WAHSATCH AND JORDAN VALLEY RAILROAD.

Mr. HOUGHTON, by unanimous consent, reported back with amendments, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, the bill (H. R. No. 1885) granting to the Wahsatch and Jordan Valley Railroad Company the right of way through the public lands for the construction of a railroad and telegraph; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. CESSNA. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BELL: The petition of Edward Gallaher, for compensation for use of buildings in Augusta, Georgia, by the Commissary and Medical Departments of the United States Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DAWES: The petition of Mrs. Lucy Wrisley, of Deerfield, Massachusetts, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Mrs. Olive S. Snow, of Huntington, Massachusetts, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DONNAN: A paper for the establishment of a certain post-route in Iowa and Minnesota, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois: The petition of Norman H. Ryan, of Amboy, Lee County, Illinois, for relief, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McDILL, of Wisconsin: The petition of citizens of Superior, Wisconsin, for a specific appropriation for the improvement of Superior Harbor, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. NEGLEY: The petition of 737 citizens of the United States, consumers of steel and steel products in various forms, to maintain to the fullest extent the existing laws for the protection of the interests of American industry, as follows: 33 citizens of Nashville, Tennessee; 18 of Chicago, Illinois; 7 of Milwaukee, Wisconsin; 12 of New York and Brooklyn; 23 of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; 3 of New York and New Jersey; 1 of Buffalo, New York; 1 of Trenton, New Jersey; 5 of West Chelmsford, Massachusetts; 1 of Troy, New York; 1 of Lockport, New York; 4 of Cincinnati, Ohio; 1 of Morristown, New Jersey; 8 of Cleveland, Ohio; 1 of Litchfield, Maine; 19 of Chicago, Illinois; 4 of Saint Louis, Missouri; 1 of Providence, Rhode Island; 1 of Pawtucket, Rhode Island; 1 of Pacong, Rhode Island; 8 of Boston, Massachusetts; 1 of Quincy, Illinois; 3 of Dubuque, Iowa; 1 of Bernardston, Massachusetts; 6 of San Francisco, California; 1 of Wolcottville, Connecticut; 2 of Alliance, Ohio; 5 of Middletown, New York; 1 of New Haven, Connecticut; 1 of Deep River, Connecticut; 1 of Paterson, New Jersey; 1 of West Chelmsford, Massachusetts; 2 of Sterling, Illinois; 11 of New York and New Jersey; 15 of Cincinnati, Ohio; 1 of Alliance, Ohio; 81 of Massachusetts; 1 of Alton, Illinois; 1 of Denver, Colorado; 9 of Beaver Falls, Pennsylvania; 1 of New Albany, Indiana; 1 of Dayton, Ohio; 7 of Connecticut; 1 of Youngstown, Ohio; 3 of Saint Louis, Missouri; 3 of Pern, Illinois; 1 of Leavenworth, Kansas; 8 of Keokuk, Iowa; 8 of Beaver Falls, Pennsylvania; 26 of Lowell, Massachusetts; 6 of Rockford, Illinois; 6 of Wilmington, Delaware; 4 of Williamsport, Pennsylvania; 1 of Geneva, Ohio; 5 of Saint Louis, Missouri; 1 of Bellefonte, Pennsylvania; 9 of Pennsylvania; 7 of Chattanooga, Tennessee; 6 of Cincinnati, Ohio; 1 of Xenia, Ohio; 9 of Newark, New Jersey; 4 of Louisville, Kentucky; 1 of Baltimore, Maryland; 4 of Waterbury, Connecticut; 2 of Bristol, Connecticut; 1 of Unionville, Connecticut; 94 of New York; 1 of Poughkeepsie, New York; 3 of Cohoes, New York; 1 of Troy, New York; 1 of Pottstown, Pennsylvania; 91 of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; 80 of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. NILES: The petition of Armistead Burwell, of Vicksburgh, Mississippi, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. VANCE: Papers relating to the claim of Ephraim Clayton, of Asheville, North Carolina, to accompany House bill No. 3113, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WHEELER: Estimate of receipts and expenditures of pension agency at Brooklyn, New York, from April 1, 1873, to March 31, 1874, to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, the petition of sundry lumber dealers and owners of planing-mills, for the passage of House bill No. 2906, to the Committee on Patents.

Also, the petition of citizens of Hammond, Saint Lawrence County, New York, for the prepayment of postage on all printed matter sent through the mails, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin: The memorial of the common council of the city of Janesville, Wisconsin, in relation to the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, to the Committee on Commerce.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, May 4, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

On motion of Mr. FENTON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Friday last was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the petition of George A. Pickett, of Norfolk, Virginia, praying the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WASHBURN presented three petitions of citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, ship-owners and merchants, praying the abolition of the present system of compulsory pilotage; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WASHBURN. I also have a petition which was forwarded to Senator Sumner, by colored citizens of Virginia, in favor of the passage of his civil-rights bill, the day previous to his death.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be laid on the table, the Committee on the Judiciary having reported the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN. Under the circumstances, sir, if it is proper, I should like to have a paragraph from the communication accompanying this petition read—simply the paragraph which I have marked in brackets.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter referred to will be read if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Your name is loved and honored by all these poor colored people, who have heard of your devotion to their civil rights. We sympathize deeply with your disappointment in the delay of Congress to pass the bill.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HAMLIN presented three petitions of merchants, ship-owners, and ship-masters of the town of Jonesport, Maine, of the town of Columbia Falls, Maine, and the town of Sullivan, Maine, praying the abolition of the present system of compulsory pilotage; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition signed by a large number of business men, bankers, and merchants of the city of Cleveland, Ohio, praying Congress to pass a bill to unlock and repeal the reserve required to be held by national banks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING presented a petition of hop-growers in the county of Oneida, New York, praying the imposition of a duty of fifteen cents a pound on imported hops; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also the memorial of the Marine Society of Boston, of the Marine Insurance Company of Massachusetts, and of the Board of Commissioners of Pilots of the State of New York, asking Congress to do nothing to impair the existing pilot system, and remonstrating against the bill now pending before the Committee on Commerce on that subject. This memorial sets forth in detail, and clearly, arguments insisting that a system of pilotage such as exists now in substance is a sine qua non of commerce, and that such a bill as is pending, should it become a law, would destroy it. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented the petition of E. H. Hartwell, praying for authority to employ and pay counsel in prosecuting her claim for a widow's pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the petition and accompanying papers of Benjamin D. Lakin, praying that the sum of $1,000 paid by him for a substitute during the late war may be refunded, be recommitted to the Committee on Claims, in order that the committee may consider testimony that has been received since the making of their report.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALCORN presented a memorial of citizens of Louisiana, asking additional appropriations for the relief of the sufferers in that State by reason of the overflow of the Mississippi River occasioned by a break in one of the levees thereof; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented a resolution of the Essex North District Medical Society, Massachusetts, and a resolution of the Suffolk Medical Society, Massachusetts, in favor of the passage of a bill to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Elizabeth B. McCormick be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

SUFFERERS FROM OVERFLOW OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. PEASE. I rise to a question in the nature of a privileged question, a question appealing to the humanity and philanthropy of the American Congress. I desire that some action be had by the Senate looking to recalling the bill which passed the Senate on Friday last making an appropriation for the sufferers by the overflow of the Mississippi River in Louisiana. I have received within the last forty-eight hours telegrams from various portions of Mississippi, representing a fearful condition of suffering among the people living on the border of that river. In one county, the sheriff telegraphs me, that there are at least five thousand people suffering to-day for bread. In another county the sheriff telegraphs me that three or four thousand are suffering for the necessaries of life.

The bill that passed the Senate authorized the Secretary of War to expend $90,000 in supplies to sufferers. I saw the Secretary of War on Saturday, and he tells me that the amount appropriated will supply but a small portion of the sufferers in Louisiana alone. I have received, in addition, a telegram from the governor of Mississippi, stating that he had taken pains to inform himself as to the amount and extent of suffering, and that there are to-day at least twenty-five thousand sufferers in our State from the overflow of the Mississippi. I have in my hand a resolution that I desire to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River," which passed the Senate May 1, 1874.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know that I shall object to having the bill recalled, but I desire to say that when that bill was before the Committee on Appropriations a suggestion was made of an amendment for this particular purpose; but there was no evidence upon the subject whatever, and the statements were of such a character in relation to it that the committee did not feel justified in making an appropriation. I have no right to anticipate what may come if this bill should be brought back and referred to the committee again. The Senator who moves this resolution probably is advised; I was not in when he was making statements, if he made any, in regard to it. Unless there is some testimony upon the subject, the Senator will judge for himself whether there will be any advantage in having the bill recalled.

Mr. PEASE. I will state to the Senator that I hold in my hand several telegrams from sheriffs of counties bordering on the river and from the governor of the State representing a fearful condition among the people on that river. My object in offering this resolution is to get the bill back to the Senate that we may amend it by increasing the appropriation from $90,000 to such amount as the Senate may deem proper.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senator whether it is based on the information that was before the committee on the former occasion?

Mr. PEASE. No, sir; this is recent information which I have received within the last forty-eight hours.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What is the nature of it, may I be permitted to inquire?

Mr. PEASE. I will read to the Senator a telegram from the governor of Mississippi dated May 2: "There are at least twenty-five thousand sufferers from the overflow in this State." I have a telegram from the sheriff of Warren County, a county bordering on the river, saying "Five or six thousand people in Warren County suffering from overflow. We need the aid of the Government. We have sent a petition to the governor with twenty-five thousand names asking for aid." I have this telegram from Natchez: "Lower part of Adams County is completely under water. One thousand people need provisions. The governor telegraphs that you can possibly get relief for us. Do so at once."

This was sent to a member of the other House. I have another telegram from the sheriff of Bolivar County, in the upper portion of the State, bordering on the river, saying: "Five thousand persons in Bolivar County without bread. Will Congress help us immediately?"

I received a letter besides, which I have not with me, from a large planter on the river, stating that the people of Issaquena are absolutely starving to-day for bread, and that the people in the city of Vicksburgh had sent two boats to get them out. Many of them were drowning, hanging on to the trees, and had fled to little hillocks in that vast lake of water.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi whether the bill which he asks to have returned is not already a law of the land and in process of execution?

Mr. PEASE. I understand that it is not. I have been informed that it can be recalled and amended in the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then I would make the further suggestion that to recall it at present would retard the relief that was proposed to be granted by the $90,000 already appropriated; and if there is further evidence that more aid is required, it would be better to allow this bill to go on and to be executed at once so far as possible, and allow the other matter to be treated separately hereafter.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from Vermont is probably not aware of the fact that this $90,000 appropriated by the bill which passed the Senate the other day is simply to replace that amount of money already expended by the War Department to make that deficiency good. So far as that bill is concerned, it confers no relief whatever. The proposition was to add something more to that, but the committee had not the evidence which justified them in proposing the amendment. What might be done with equal facility probably would be to institute a new bill in the House of Representatives where the thing properly ought to originate. I suggested that to the honorable Senator from Mississippi; but he thinks it advisable to move here. I do not care to object; but if the bill comes back the Senator will be prepared, I trust, to show us some evidence on which we can act.

Mr. PEASE. I simply desire to expedite the matter, and I want to take the most practicable means of effecting it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senate will see at once, I think, that this bill ought not to be recalled. It is merely to settle an existing account at the War Department for expenditures already made. There is no necessity for recalling that. If the Senator desires a further appropriation, it seems to me that the better course would be to introduce an original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know what the usages are. My notion about it is that there is no parliamentary objection to recalling the bill, as the Senate has had no information on the subject of the fate of the measure since it left the Senate. If it is still lying on the Speaker's table, as perhaps we have a right to presume it is, and it has not been signed by the Speaker, I am not aware of any parliamentary objection to recalling it if the Senate is disposed to do so.

Mr. ANTHONY. But I do not see the advantage of recalling this bill for the purpose of putting an amendment on it over an original proposition. It seems to me that this measure of relief having been voted, it is best to carry it out, and then if the Senator from Mississippi desires to introduce another bill for further relief, that can stand upon its own merits; and upon his statement I should think it had a great deal of merit. But I do not see what advantage we get toward a new appropriation by withdrawing the one already made, or how this bill before us and amended can pass any quicker than a new bill that might be introduced.

Mr. PEASE. I simply propose to amend the bill when recalled by adding to the amount appropriated. The Secretary of War told me that if the bill had not already passed Congress, as he supposed it had, if the amount were increased he could furnish the supplies needed. My object is simply to increase the amount appropriated if we can recall the bill this morning and get it through to-day. I thought that the most expeditious way of affording relief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi.

The resolution was agreed to.

Afterward a message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, returning the bill, when, on motion of Mr. PEASE, the vote on the passage of the bill was reconsidered and also the vote ordering it to a third reading.

Mr. PEASE submitted an amendment to increase the amount appropriated by the bill from $90,000 to $250,000; and, on his motion, the bill was recommitted, with the amendment, to the Committee on Appropriations.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF 1812.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to give notice that I will on to-morrow or at some other day, when I may have the ear of the Senate, report back without amendment a bill of the House (H. R. No. 2190) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty. This is a very important bill and will largely increase the pension-list for a few years, and I have thought it would be proper in reporting the bill back to submit some observations to the Senate, and if it suits the convenience of the Senate, to-morrow or at some future early day, I shall be glad to have its ear when I make the formal report.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana whether the committee will report favorably on the bill?

Mr. PRATT. A majority of the committee direct me as its chairman to report the bill back without amendment and to recommend its passage. For myself, I take exceptions to two parts of the bill, that which gives a pension to the soldier of the war of 1812 who served a single day. I think those soldiers ought to be put upon the same footing as to pensions that they were put by the law of 1855, which granted bounty-land warrants to the soldiers of the war of 1812, that is to those who served a period of fourteen days or more.

Mr. HAMLIN. Or who were in battle.

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir; or who were in battle. There is another respect in which I think the bill ought to be amended. This bill gives pensions to widows who were married previous to the year 1850 to soldiers of the war of 1812 and who survive them. I think the limit should not reach further down than the year 1825, enlarging the limit of the present law ten years. In those two respects I think the bill ought to be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate have heard the notice given by the Senator from Indiana.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2792) granting a pension to Llewellyn Bell, have directed me to report it back without amendment. We adopt the House report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2453) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1873, have had the same under consideration and directed me to report it back with an amendment. I may observe that the bill relates to that class of invalid pensioners who have lost an arm at the elbow or above the elbow, and this House bill places them in the second class of those who have permanent specific disabilities, and raises their pension from eighteen dollars a month to twenty-four dollars. I shall ask an early consideration of the bill; not at the present time, but at some early day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 331) providing for the construction of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad and Telegraph Line, and for the performance of all Government service free of charge, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT. In the absence of the chairman of the Committe on Railroads, I am requested to state that the report just made is made by a majority of that committee, there being a minority of the committee who have not given assent to the whole bill and all its details.

Mr. THURMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 714) to authorize the Attorney-General of the United States to inquire into the condition and title to the lands of the ex-mission of San Buenaventura, in the State of California, to report it back with the recommendation that it be sent to the Committee on Private Land Claims, where it properly belongs, and to which committee the papers in the case have been sent.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of Norvin Green, vice-president of the International Telegraph Company, reported a bill (S. No. 766) to grant an American register to the steamship Suffolk, and to change the name of said steamship to that of Professor Morse; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of one-armed pensioners of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, praying for a change in the pension law, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of David Baker, praying that commissioned officers be allowed pensions equal to those of private soldiers, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 196) granting a pension to Peter J. Cratzer, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Andrew J. Lashley, late a private in Company K, Second United States Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 767) granting a pension to Andrew J. Lashley.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2672) granting a pension to Mary S. Loomis, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 551) granting a pension to Alfred Bolder, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 533) granting a pension to Uriah W. Briggs, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Michael Quarry, a citizen of the county of Huntingdon, Pennsylvania, praying for an act of Congress granting him a pension from March 4, 1872, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of John S. Long, Company D, First Battalion Twelfth United States Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 768) granting a pension to John S. Long.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 88) for the better organization of the district courts of the United States within the State of Louisiana, have had the same under consideration, and instruct me to report it back and recommend its indefinite postponement. As the Senator from Louisiana who introduced the bill [Mr. WEST] is not in his seat, I think it had better go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. SCOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims to ask that a day—if there be no objection I will name Tuesday of next week—be set apart for the purpose of considering reports from that committee. There are a number of reports upon the Calendar, some of which have already been passed over under objection, and others of which will elicit discussion. We desire that a day shall be fixed for the consideration of those reports; and I ask that Tuesday of next week be set apart for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that Tuesday of next week, after the expiration of the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on Claims. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We have now got to that period of the session when I shall be obliged to make it a point to have no special orders assigned to the detriment of the appropriation bills.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator desires that condition, I have no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to make that condition here, because hereafter I shall endeavor to insist upon it in all cases. Let the order be made subject to the appropriation bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine suggests that the understanding be had subject to the condition that appropriation bills shall not be displaced by the understanding.

Mr. ANTHONY. While I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania that the bills reported from the Committee on Claims, which form a considerable portion of the bills on the Calendar that there will be no objection to, ought to be considered, yet I think the other bills ought to have a fair chance too. I think that for two or three days we ought to go through the Calendar of unobjected cases, and I mean by "unobjected cases" not those that may ultimately fail but those that will create no debate; not because those claims are entitled to any more consideration than claims which are opposed, but because in the same length of time we can do a great deal more work upon the unobjected cases than we can upon those which may give rise to debate. After that I am willing that the Committees on Claims, on Patents, on the District of Columbia, and other committees may have special days for their business; but is it not better first to take up the unobjected cases on the Calendar?

Mr. SCOTT. I entirely concur with the remark made by the Senator from Rhode Island; and in making the motion I have submitted my purpose is not to secure a preference to unobjected cases from the Committee on Claims, but to secure a hearing to those cases that do give rise to objection. There are a number of them; and it is more with reference to that class of claims that I make this motion than to secure any preference whatever to unobjected cases. I think the Senator will agree with me that there are cases of that character which will elicit discussion which ought to have a hearing, and for that purpose I make the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent and general understanding that Tuesday of next week, after the expiration of the morning hour, be set apart for the consideration of bills reported by the Committee on Claims, provided that this understanding shall not displace appropriation bills. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the order is made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. THURMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 769) for the relief of Major J. W. Nichols, paymaster United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 770) to aid and facilitate the Coosa River Slack-water Navigation Company in the construction of a steamboat canal from Gadsden, on the Coosa River, in the State of Alabama, to Wetumpka; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 771) to resume legislative control of the District of Columbia and provide for the government thereof; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Joint Committee Investigating the Affairs of the District of Columbia.

Mr. STEWART. I will state in connection with the bill that the frame-work of the bill and pretty much all of it is the measure which was prepared by the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] some years ago, with a few additions to bring it down to the present time. My object in introducing it is to have it printed for the purpose of information. I do not know whether I am for the bill or not, or that anybody else is, but the question seems to be receiving a good deal of attention, and I have thought it well to introduce the bill and have it printed, so that it may be read and examined. I move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLANAGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 772) to incorporate the Denver and Middle Park Railway and Mining Company, and to grant the right of way for the same over the public lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 773) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to approve certain bills incurred by the direct-tax commissioners; which was read twice by its title, and, with a letter of J. H. Ela, Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, accompanying the bill, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 774) to repeal so much of the laws relating to the organization of the Army of the United States as establish distinctions to the prejudice of one class of American citizens; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 775) to authorize the construction of a railroad bridge over the Willamette River, at Portland, in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 776) for the relief of Sarah A. Slingerland; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALCORN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 777) to amend the fifteenth and sixteenth sections of an act entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relative to mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States," approved February 12, 1873; which was read twice by its title, ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

TOBACCO-TAX LAWS.

Mr. THURMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance is hereby instructed to inquire and report whether the provisions of law forbidding the sale of tobacco by the producer thereof to any person not a licensed dealer ought not to be repealed.

WASHINGTON MARKET COMPANY.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be instructed to inquire, first, whether the Washington Market Company have fulfilled the conditions of the act of incorporation of May 20, 1870; the cost of the buildings erected; the rents and profits derived therefrom; and, second, what sum the said corporation have paid and are now paying annually to the city of Washington, and, if any less than the sum of $25,000 provided for in the act of incorporation, by what authority the same has been diminished; third, to inquire by what authority the said market company has obtained a lease and control of the open space at the intersection of Ohio and Louisiana avenues with Tenth and Twelfth streets, which was set apart by Congress to the city of Washington as a market for the purchase and sale of hay, straw, oats, corn, corn-meal, seed of all kinds, wood for sale from the wagon, cattle on the hoof, swine on the hoof, and country produce sold in quantities from the wagon; fourth, whether the said Washington Market Company has not failed to comply with the conditions of its charter, and therefore whether, the same being forfeited, it should not be repealed; fifth, to inquire by what legal authority the government of the District of Columbia are now proposing to erect extensive buildings on the site included in the act incorporating the Washington Market Company, and report by bill or otherwise; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There are other Senators besides myself who judge that it is absolutely necessary for Congress to take some notice of the present condition of the Washington Market Company. By the act of 1870 they were to construct buildings, and a plan was exhibited to the Senate covering the ground between Seventh and Ninth streets and with a front on Pennsylvania avenue, at a cost supposed to amount to not less than from seven hundred and fifty thousand to a million dollars. The company have gone on and constructed a building here that serves the purpose very well as a market so far as it goes, and not including any building on Pennsylvania avenue, but at an expense, as it is supposed, of not more than $250,000, from which they are receiving very large rentals; and now under an act of Congress passed last year, a clause that was somehow inserted in an appropriation bill, they attempt to avoid the larger expenditure, the expenditure of at least half a million and perhaps seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and to throw that burden upon the District of Columbia, besides relieving themselves of a large sum they were to pay to the District annually. I will read the clause, (United States Statutes at Large, volume 17, page 540:)

> For the purchase by the United States of the interest of the District of Columbia in the present city-hall building in Washington, now used solely for Government purposes, such sum as may be determined by three impartial appraisers to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior, not exceeding $75,000, the same to be applied by said District only for the erection of a suitable building for the District offices; and the governor and board of public works are authorized, if they deem it advisable for that purpose, to make arrangements to secure sufficient land fronting on Pennsylvania and Louisiana avenues, between Seventh and Ninth streets: Provided, That the Government of the United States shall not be liable for any expenditures for said land or for the purchase-money therefor, or for the buildings to be erected thereon; and no land, or the use thereof, is hereby granted for the purpose of erecting any building thereon for such building.

I do not suppose that there were five men in either House of Congress who understood by this provision that the Washington Market Company were to be relieved from any of their obligations or stipulations in the original act of incorporation; and yet by a simple provision that the District of Columbia may purchase land on Pennsylvania avenue, between Seventh and Ninth streets, I understand that this Washington Market Company have made a contract with the District of Columbia that they shall take the responsibility of putting up the front buildings there and that the company shall be released from the annual payment of a very large share of the $25,000 that it was originally stipulated they should pay to the support of the poor of this District.

Under the circumstances it seems to me very clear that they have forfeited their charter by erecting buildings which in no respect are in accordance with the original plan; and in the original charter it will be seen that Congress retained the right to alter or amend the charter as they might see fit, and it was also contemplated that the charter might be forfeited by a non-compliance with the conditions imposed. The company appear to have done whatever would most promote their interests, without heeding in the least the terms of the act of Congress. If they could please themselves and by any means obtain the consent of the District government it seems to have been enough. Under these circumstances, as now it is apparent to those of us who pass by this spot that the District of Columbia or somebody are making excavations preparatory to the erection of government buildings here for the District of Columbia, and as it is pretty notorious that there is a general impression that this territorial government of the District of Columbia will be rather a short-lived one, that it is too expensive to survive a very great length of time, it would seem to be inexpedient that a very large sum should now be expended for the purpose of erecting buildings for this territorial government; and at all events I think that it is the duty of Congress to investigate this matter and see whether this company have complied with the stipulations in the original act of incorporation, as it would seem that any impartial court having jurisdiction would decide that they have fallen very far short of it.

The resolutions were agreed to.

SAINT PAUL AND PACIFIC RAILROAD GRANT.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to call up Senate bill No. 486. I have endeavored to do so several times, and I appeal to the Senate now to dispose of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 486) to revive and continue certain grants of lands heretofore made to the Territory and State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of the several lines of the Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad Company.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will not take up any time; but I desire to move——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments reported by the Committee on Public Lands will be first read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment is to strike out in line 8 the words "Sauk Rapids" and insert "Watab."

Mr. RAMSEY. Before the Senate proceed to act on the committee's amendments, I will say that since our last meeting and since my last effort to get up this bill, the Senator from Vermont who is not now in his seat [Mr. EDMUNDS] submitted to me a modification of the bill which I reluctantly consented to; but I presume in good faith I should now bring it to the attention of the Senate. He considered the whole subject with me, and I will submit that amendment as a substitute for the bill in his absence. If he were here I would prefer that he should do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed substitute will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before that is read, I will ask if the last amendment proposed by the Committee on Public Lands is omitted from this compilation submitted by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. RAMSEY. What is the last amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. The last amendment was a clause reviving all the land grants in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. RAMSEY. The whole bill is simply to revive a land grant in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I speak of an amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. RAMSEY. There was no such amendment reported.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Vermont called my attention to it.

Mr. RAMSEY. Whatever it is, he has modified it and given it to me in the shape he will assent to the bill; and I presume he has in his person all the opposition there is to grants of this kind.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator will see on examination of the bill that there is no general revival.

Mr. STEVENSON. May I inquire how much land is granted by this bill?

Mr. RAMSEY. There is no new grant of lands.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understand that; but it is a revival of an old grant.

Mr. RAMSEY. There are three hundred and eighty miles of railroad in this grant. The grant was substantially of March 3, 1871. From that date is all the time this company have had. There are three hundred and eighty miles of road, and the grant was ten sections of land to the mile of railroad. In that time, notwithstanding the difficulty in monetary arrangements, three hundred and twenty miles of this line had been graded and fifty-eight partially graded, the iron has been laid on one hundred and forty-three miles, and on two hundred and thirty-seven miles it has not been laid. Six hundred and twenty-five thousand cross-ties have been delivered along the line of the road, all of which will be damaged and go to ruin unless this grant is renewed. The money invested already is three and a half millions.

Mr. THURMAN. Was the grant of land ten sections on each side or five sections?

Mr. RAMSEY. Five sections on each side; it was a grant of alternate sections.

Mr. THURMAN. Making ten sections to the mile?

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes, sir; but there is no new power in this bill. It is simply a renewal of a grant so recent as 1871. I can scarcely conceive that the Senate will for a moment think of destroying all this amount of property invested in this way for no sufficient reason, when you consider the short time that has elapsed in the construction of this road since the year 1871.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act for the extension of time to the Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad Company for the completion of its road," be, and the same is hereby, revived and extended until the 3d day of March, A. D. 1876, and no longer, upon the following conditions:

First. That all the rights of actual settlers, and their grantees, who have heretofore in good faith entered upon and actually resided on any of said lands prior to the passage of this act shall be saved and secured to such settlers in all respects, the same as if said lands had never been granted to aid in the construction of the said lines of railroad.

Second, That the company taking the benefit of this act shall, before enjoying any rights under it, by a certificate made and signed by its president and a majority at least of its directors, and under the seal of the corporation, accept the conditions contained in this act and file such acceptance in the Department of the Interior for record and preservation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Here is the clause to which I referred. I want to know whether this clause is in the amended bill. The last clause of the bill provides:

And the parties so completing the same shall be entitled to all the lands which the said Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad Company would have been entitled to had it completed the said lines of railroad under and in accordance with the grants and extensions heretofore made to the Territory of Minnesota to aid in the construction of said lines of railroad.

Mr. RAMSEY. That is now out of the bill entirely.

Mr. STEVENSON. This is too important a bill, it seems to me, to be considered without some further information. If I understand the bill, it grants originally two and one-half million acres of land to a single railroad company in a single State; and that is to be considered in the morning hour without any discussion. I should like one of the Senators from Minnesota to explain it. If the grant has expired, then this is equivalent to a new grant. If it has not expired, then you do not want any legislation. I think the sentiment of the country is opposed to granting amounts of land twice as much as one whole State in this Union; and, if I am informed rightly, this grant was once renewed.

Mr. RAMSEY. For nine months, from the 4th of March, 1873.

Mr. STEVENSON. It was renewed for the period asked, and the road was not finished; and now we are called upon to legislate again and to grant this immense amount of land without any explanation, and in the morning hour. I should like to hear the Senators. I do not wish to interfere with any local bills, but I am opposed to these immense grants of the public domain to private corporations, and I think the sentiment of the country is opposed to them. I think if this bill be passed every land grant that has now gone by in consequence of the parties not building the road will be renewed; you will at least reopen that whole system, and the Congress of the United States will never know where they are going to stop.

Mr. WINDOM. There is no new land-grant in the bill. It is true that the time for the construction of the road as limited by Congress has expired. On the 3d of March, 1873, Congress passed an extension for nine months. There is a written report accompanying the bill showing that it was not completed within the nine months owing to the disturbed condition of financial matters in Europe, and the failure to receive the funds that had been arranged for. But in the mean time the persons engaged to complete the road have expended upon it over $500,000 of their own money, which they will probably lose, unless this extension be granted; and in addition to that, it will be utterly impossible to construct the road unless the grant be extended. If it were a new grant, I think the argument of the Senator from Kentucky would be applicable; but it is nothing more nor less than an extension of an old grant for a period of two years. The parties have been guilty of no laches in this matter. Since the act was passed, in 1871, they have built a large amount of road, as stated by my colleague. At one time during the summer of 1872 they had twenty-five hundred men employed on the road, and every effort has been made that it was possible to make to finish it.

There is another view of this question which we regard as very important in the Northwest. This line is to form a connecting link between the system of American roads and the improvements about to be made in Manitoba. The Dominion government, as I am informed, only await information as to whether this road is to be completed to the boundary line to commence theirs, extending from our northern boundary northward to Fort Garry and through improvements of the Saskatchewan River extending to the Rocky Mountains. It is very important to that whole country. It is only just, I think, that it should be extended, in view of the efforts that have been made and the very short time given by the former extension. I earnestly hope the Senate will not sacrifice the large amount of property that will be sacrificed by the defeat of this bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, let us get at the facts in this case, because I apprehend that this is only one of a number of cases in which we may be asked for the same kind of relief. In fact we have again and again revived some of these grants which had lapsed and which we never ought to have revived. Now, I should like the Senator from Minnesota to tell me what is the length of this road. I understand it runs from Saint Paul to the boundary, the forty-ninth parallel.

Mr. WINDOM. From Saint Cloud to Saint Vincent, a distance of three hundred and twenty miles, the iron is laid one hundred and thirty-nine miles.

Mr. THURMAN. Is that the entire length of the road?

Mr. WINDOM. That is the entire length of that branch. There is another branch from Watab to Brainerd, about sixty miles. On that the entire grading is done; the ties are out and the bridging is completed.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I understand that something over one hundred miles of the road have been completed. Is that so?

Mr. RAMSEY. On one hundred and forty-three miles the iron has been laid. The whole road is over three hundred and eighty miles long, three hundred and twenty-two west and sixty miles north. One hundred and forty-three miles of road have been laid with iron. The line is fully graded three hundred and twenty-two miles, and partially graded fifty-eight miles. The bridges for the whole line are in preparation. The timber has been cut and the iron is being prepared. A million and a half of ties are scattered along the line of the road.

Mr. THURMAN. In respect to the one hundred and forty miles—if that is the number of miles completed—the company, I suppose, as a matter of course has received its lands, so that it is not deprived of that bounty which the Government promised it for a completion of the road. So far as it has completed it even within the extended time, nobody questions, I suppose, its right to the lands, and probably it has received them before this. The question, then, is whether or not we will now, for I understand from the Senator from Minnesota that the grant has lapsed by the expiration of time——

Mr. WINDOM. The time has expired.

Mr. THURMAN. Then the question is whether we shall revive that grant. I cannot see that in any other light than a new land grant. If the people of this country are opposed to anything, it is to subsidies of that kind. I cannot vote for any of them.

Mr. WINDOM. If it be a new land grant, it is under peculiar circumstances. I think it is hard to call it a land grant in any sense. The unfinished road has been graded; the bridging is all ready; the ties are all out; there remains of the entire unfinished portion but about six hundred thousand yards of grading, and these parties have made every effort within their power, they have been guilty of no neglect, and they will be involved in very great loss without their fault if the time be not extended, in addition to the very great loss to the whole of Northern Minnesota and to the country generally.

Mr. BOGY. I am aware of the popular sentiment existing upon this subject, but I think to apply it to the present bill would be a misapplication. This is not a new grant to a railroad. It is an extension of time to enable a railroad to be completed and get the benefit of a grant heretofore made. We in the West feel a very large interest in the completion of this road, and I am a little astonished that the opposition comes from that section which will be the most benefited by the completion of this road. A large portion of the road is completed. It is true there may be only one hundred and forty connected miles completed, but in point of fact more than seven-eighths of the entire work is now finished. I will read for the information of the Senate from the report made by the committee on the subject, which will explain the case better than I can in a speech:

On the line from Watab to Brainerd, distance sixty miles, the grading and bridging are completed for fifty-three miles, uncompleted for three miles, and iron laid on four miles, cross-ties and timber all furnished on the ground. On the line from Saint Cloud to Saint Vincent, distance three hundred and twenty miles, iron is laid on one hundred and thirty-nine miles, to wit, from Saint Cloud to Melrose, thirty-five miles, and from a point twelve miles south of Glyndon Junction, on the Northern Pacific Railroad, to a point ninety-two miles north of said junction, in all one hundred and four miles, which, with the thirty-five miles mentioned, makes an aggregate, as stated, of one hundred and thirty-nine miles. Between Glyndon Junction and Saint Vincent the grading is entirely completed and bridges ready for a distance of fifty miles, leaving thirteen miles only of light grading to complete to the British line. Between Saint Cloud and Glyndon Junction the grading is completed for seventy-five miles, leaving but forty-two miles uncompleted. In the aggregate there remains upon all the lines not to exceed six hundred thousand cubic yards of earthwork.

Here is a road three hundred and eighty miles in length and it only requires six hundred thousand cubic yards of earthwork. The completion of the road to the northern line of the United States will at least cause a contract to be made for a railroad from that point in the province of Canada to the waters of Hudson's Bay. The distance is about one hundred miles, and they are waiting for this to be an assured fact to give out a contract to build a road from the northern line of the United States to Hudson's Bay, thus completing the longest line of railroad running north and south on the globe, connecting the waters of Hudson's Bay with the Gulf of Mexico.

I will not detain the Senate; but I know the feeling in the country that I come from in regard to this measure. It is to us a matter of great importance, and I hope therefore the bill will pass. I have examined it very carefully. It is not a new grant; it is merely an extension of time to enable this company to complete work which is already partially done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is an amendment which I wish to move to perfect the one that I suggested to the honorable Senator from Minnesota, [Mr RAMSEY.] The saving clause to actual settlers is now confined to actual settlers, whereas it ought to be a saving clause also of the rights of other persons who have legal rights, if any, in the lands. I therefore move to insert after the word "act" the words "or who otherwise have legal rights in any of such lands."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then after the word "settlers" in line 8, to make it harmonious, it should say "or such other persons," so as to cover the legal rights of everybody.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. STEVENSON. On the passage of the bill I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As this bill is to be voted upon by yeas and nays, I wish to say a single word. As the bill now stands I shall vote for it, holding at the same time to my political faith and my duty as a Senator, as I look at it, to stand up rigidly for the preservation of the public lands against grants for any purposes except for settlement. On inquiry into the circumstances of this particular case under the act of 1873, which I believe passed without opposition, I find that this particular company has been in apparent good faith making strenuous efforts to complete this line; that it has done work along the whole course of it, and through the stress of the financial disturbances of the last summer and fall it has failed to entirely complete and finish it within the time limited. I regard this bill, therefore, as a reasonable relief against what would be a technical forfeiture, and to be equitable and right for that reason. If it had been a grant that had been since the last legislation allowed to slumber, and it was being revived as an ancient one under which proceedings had not been latterly and earnestly taken in the best of faith, then I should think otherwise; but I do not regard it as infringing on the wholesome rule that my friend from Kentucky and myself believe in, of holding on to the public lands, but rather as doing an act of justice and equity to these gentlemen which the nature of the case and the last year's experience about money matters seems to me to make proper.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Cameron, Carpenter, Chandler, Conover, Dorsey, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Ingalls, Kelly, Logan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Scott, Stewart, Tipton, Wadleigh, Washburn, and Windom—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Davis, Hager, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, and Wright—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Clayton, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, McCreery, Morton, Norwood, Robertson, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, Stockton, and West—33.

So the bill was passed. Its title was amended so as to read: "A bill to extend the act of March 3, 1873, entitled 'An act for the extension of time to the Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad Company for the completion of its road.'"

Mr. McCREERY. I ask consent to record my vote on the bill just passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is impossible. The rule prevents it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot be done under the rule.

Mr. McCREERY. I should vote against the bill, and supposed by unanimous consent I might be allowed to do so, as I just came into the Chamber as the result was announced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A vote is not allowed to be recorded after the result has been announced from the Chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 554) for the relief of William I. Blackistone, of Saint Mary's County, Maryland;

A bill (H. R. No. 1562) for the relief of Jacob Parmerter, reimbursing him for defending a suit brought against him for an official act; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1230) granting a pension to Elizabeth W. Prindle, guardian of the minors of Joseph F. Doak, deceased.

SUPPLEMENTARY CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of Friday last, which is the bill (S. No. 1) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to strike out the second section, on which the Senator from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NORWOOD. Mr. President——

Mr. FENTON. Mr. President, I inquire of the honorable Senator from Georgia if he is desirous of going on at this time to conclude his remarks this morning? If so, I will defer what I wish to present until the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. NORWOOD. I would give way to the Senator with pleasure but that I want to conclude my remarks on this question.

[Mr. NORWOOD addressed the Senate, concluding the speech commenced by him on Thursday last. See Appendix.]

Mr. FENTON. Mr. President ——

Mr. BOUTWELL. With the consent of the Senator from New York, I wish to offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I will send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "benevolence," in line 8 of section 1, it is proposed to insert the words "authorized by law and endowed by the United States, or hereafter endowed by any State, or;" so as to read:

> And also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence, authorized by law and endowed by the United States, or hereafter endowed by any State, or supported, in whole or in part, by general taxation.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senator from New York to give way, that we may have an executive session for the remainder of the afternoon.

Mr. FENTON. Owing to matters of a private character relating to the disposition of my time, I would prefer to go on this afternoon. It may be absolutely inconvenient for me to be here to-morrow, and the Senate is thin, I am sure, for the purposes for which my friend from California desires an executive session.

Ms. LOGAN. I hope the Senator from New York will be allowed to go on now.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well.

Mr. FENTON. If there is no objection on the part of any Senator, and I suppose there will not be any, I will ask unanimous consent that the bill now up for consideration be passed over informally that I may enter a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the pending bill be laid aside informally. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

Mr. FENTON. Then, bearing in mind the notice that I gave on Friday last that I would move to discharge the Committee on Commerce from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 13, to regulate the service in the collection of customs at the various ports of entry in the United States, and the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the laws relating to customs, and for other purposes, I will proceed to discuss the bill before the Senate. This method of proceeding to its discussion may be a little novel, but I think the application will be apparent to all.

Mr. President, it is with some reluctance that I return to this work in which I have often been repulsed. A sense of duty alone impels me to speak again. Now more than two years ago, in advocacy of the bill I had previously introduced to regulate the service in the collection of the customs revenue and to remedy the growing evils of the moiety practice, I pointed out many of the defects of the system, the hardships experienced, and the vices to which it led. In vain then, or thereafter, was my appeal to take up the bill. No one here or there came forward to encourage and strengthen the movement. Not here, because it was not to be permitted to disturb this field for party maneuver and advantage, nor the friends quartered upon it. Not there, because of the terror to importers and others from bad laws in the hands of bad men. Now the case is changed; at least so far as an aroused feeling outside the Capitol, and if I were sure of a like feeling within, it would not be necessary for me to raise my voice again in this cause. It is rather because of my fear that the sense of injustice and the indignation which at last quickens the people has not reached this Chamber that I am led to again engage in the discussion. I do not complain that, chiefly for opposing the unequal and unjust laws relating to customs revenue, which were badly executed and likely to be worse in the hands of those who were being called to administer them, I suffered party proscription long before I went to Cincinnati. That is wholly unimportant to me personally and to my present purpose. But I beseech Senators that no prejudice of political attitude shall be allowed to impair anything of merit upon this grave public question which may now fall from my lips.

The main objects of the bill are—

First, to adjust the compensation of the officers of customs upon the basis of salaries, having in mind fair pay for responsibility and labor.

Second, to dispense with the whole disgraceful moiety business, allowing only a reduced share in cases of smuggling to officers making actual seizure.

Third, to simplify the cumbrous and intricate regulations and laws, to the end that both the Government and the importer shall be justly viewed and fairly protected.

These points, and other features of the bill relating to undervaluations, appraisements, &c., upon which I will not now dwell, embrace the principal objects of the Chambers of Commerce of New York, Boston, and other cities, and are the foundation of all other bills introduced in either House during the present session.

A brief reference to the record of this unfortunate bill may not be out of place. I had the honor to first introduce it March 7, 1871. On the 13th of that month it was referred to the Committee on Finance. That committee, after consulting with many persons familiar with the service, with officers of the Treasury Department, and especially with the then Secretary, directed me to report it back to the Senate, very little changed, December 20, 1871, and recommend its passage. January 8, 1872, I addressed the Senate, explaining its provisions. Action upon it was then deferred; and again when it was reached in the regular order February 12 and 13, at which latter date members of the Committee on Commerce opposed its consideration upon the ground that it ought to be first referred to them, as it properly belonged there, &c. This claim was resisted, and the bill went over. The members of the committee then were Messrs. CHANDLER, CONKLING, BUCKINGHAM, SPENCER, KELLOGG, Corbett, and Vickers. March 2, the same session, it was made to give way to some other order of business, and again April 10. Subsequently it was postponed for the purpose, as alleged, of hearing from the committee which was then investigating the New York custom-house affairs. This last plea carried the bill beyond the session, as that committee did not report until its very last days. On the 9th of the following December I renewed the effort, but was again met by the Committee on Commerce with the old but illogical argument that it should first go through their official hands. This committee remained very little changed, and still conspicuous among its members are found the names of Messrs. CHANDLER, CONKLING, BUCKINGHAM, and SPENCER. Finally, as I despaired of any action unless through the sanction of the Commerce Committee, a few days later I addressed the Senate as follows:

> Before proceeding to the cases on the Calendar, I desire to move that the bill (S. No. 2) to regulate the service in the collection of customs at the ports of entry in the United States, and the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the laws relating to customs, and for other purposes, which is a special order, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

After stating that action upon it had frequently been resisted upon the assumption that it ought first to be considered in that committee, I concluded with the remark:

> I think that the bill was properly considered in the Committee on Finance; but I have no pride myself in the matter. I am not now on the committee, and I do not know that the present members care to make a battle in this behalf or to retain the subject within that committee. Therefore, having only the desire that the bill may have favorable and early action, I have moved this reference.

The motion was agreed to. It remained in this secure and undisturbed resting-place during that entire session. But believing nothing impossible and everything that is right sure to prevail at last, I introduced the bill again the first day of the present session and referred it to the Committee on Commerce. On the 18th of February I called attention to the fact, upon the petition of a large number of merchants of New York asking for its immediate passage, and at the same time made an appeal to the committee to give us an opportunity to advance the reform which the bill assured.

I have deemed it best to give this brief history of the case before proceeding with the discussion, to the end that whatever responsibility attached to delay might rest in the right quarter.

To form a correct opinion of our present system for the collection of duties on imports prescribed or permitted by Congress, and the importance of modification or amendment of that system, we must first have a distinct perception of what it is. The end to be sought in all the legislation upon this subject is the raising of money on imported merchandise for the use of the Government. But in considering the whole subject, it is necessary to keep the end to be secured distinct from the means provided for the attainment of the end. An apt illustration of what I mean is to be found in the laws of the first Congress which assembled under the present Constitution. One is dated July 4, 1789, and is entitled "An act for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States." The other law to which I refer was passed July 31, 1789, but is entitled "An act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States." This distinction, clearly defined in the title of these two enactments passed within twenty-seven days of each other, runs through the whole customs-revenue legislation by Congress. We have had conflicting, incongruous, and vicious legislation under the former head; but it is mainly of the excesses and injustice of the latter during the past few years that the country now so loudly complains.

In 1799, and ever since, both specific and ad valorem rates of duty have been levied. With one exception, ad valorem rates have been levied on the foreign, not the home cost or value. Under this revenue act the collector estimated and levied duty upon the face of the invoice and entry without calling for the report of appraisers. It was only when there was no invoice, or he had reason to suspect fraud, that appraisement was made, and then by two merchants, one selected by himself and the other by the importer. There were various modifications and changes, mainly of details, in relation to the customs revenue generally, and in regard to the duty to be imposed on imported goods in 1818, 1823, 1830, and 1842, but there was no substantial change in respect to the requirements of invoices or forfeiture for false invoices up to 1863. It will be found upon an examination of the several acts that the law required one kind of invoice for purchased goods and another kind for goods sent here by the manufacturer. The former must be a transcript of the actual transaction with the seller, giving the actual cost or the sum paid therefor to the seller, including charges for packing, &c. On the other hand, in respect to goods sent by a manufacturer, as there had been no transaction of purchase and sale, the invoice must contain the fair market value of the merchandise, which means the price which it would have brought if sold in the market at the time and place it was procured, and not necessarily at the time and place of shipment. Then, again, previous to the act of 1863, merchandise could not be forfeited for a false or defective invoice in court, unless the jury were satisfied that it was made false with intent to evade payment of duty which the person who made or presented the invoice knew was legally chargeable thereon. The intent, as known to the law, was to evade the payment of money which was fairly chargeable and due as duty. Everything worked very well up to this time; at least, in the operation of the law and regulations, neither the importer nor the Government could much complain. So, it may be said, that from the act of 1863 begins the organized rascality which has been increasing through the subsequent years, until it has culminated in gross extortion and corruption, not to say crime.

This act of March 3, 1863, as will be seen by an examination of its provisions, declares that if any owner, consignee, or agent shall knowingly make, or attempt to make, an entry by any false invoice or false consular certificate, or any other false or fraudulent practice or appliances whatsoever, said goods or their value shall be forfeited. In this law it will be seen that the intent to evade the payment of duty is carefully omitted. The word is "knowingly;" that is, if the jury believe that the person making the entry knew or had reason to suppose that some paper connected with the transaction was not in all respects perfectly correct, however minute or technical the item or fact, they must find against him. In effect, the law virtually declares forfeiture for any omission, mistake, or false statement, for the fact ascertained is prima facie evidence of knowledge. So the owner or claimant of the merchandise must satisfy the jury that the document was not by the person making the entry known or believed to be in any particular false. The question of intent to defraud the revenue was not necessarily involved in the question at all. The importer was not even permitted to defend by showing that the Government had lost no duty. By this crafty legislation, inspired by disingenuous parties, the importer was told in effect, "It is not for you to inquire whether or not the Government is the loser, whether or not the revenue suffers; we have other aims more important to us and to our friends than the interests of Government or importer;" and, I repeat, unless the latter could satisfy the jury that he was ignorant, a verdict confiscating his property must be found. It will be observed that neither the law of 1863 nor subsequent amendments were in the least calculated to facilitate the collection of the revenue. On the contrary, they were an excrescence upon the system, and operated to delay and embarrass at every step. And my object in calling attention to them is, not so much in the hope of securing at once all the requisite changes, as to show how injustice to the importer under their ægis is carried on by selfish officials, and to effect an overthrow of the abuses they practice.

I will not dwell upon the several acts relating to the appraisal of merchandise; they run through the statutes of 1823, 1828, 1830, 1842, and 1851; but remark that our present system was authorized by the law of July 27, 1866. It is unnecessary to here state even the general features of this law, as whatever seems important to my argument will be disclosed as I proceed.

The ninth section of that act directed certain costs and charges therein specified to be added to the appraised value in order to make the dutiable value. So it will be found that the importer is subjected to several statements relating to each importation; one is known as the invoice value, one as the appraised value, and another as dutiable value. As the law stands, the entry must be a transcript of the invoice. But at the same time, if the appraised value exceeds the entered value 10 per cent., a penalty follows of 20 per cent. ad valorem. The importer is not permitted to add on his entry to the invoice value in order to bring it up to the market value to be found by the appraiser. That would be too fair, as it would enable the merchant to provide for a case where the value had suddenly advanced between the date of invoice and the date of exportation. In a word, the case stands thus: An importer must produce an invoice stating the actual price he paid if the goods are purchased, and if they are not purchased, the actual value at the time of procurement; the entry paper at the custom-house must contain a transcript of this invoice; the merchandise must be valued by the appraiser at the date of exportation. If this appraised value, with costs and charges added, exceeds the invoice or entered value more than 10 per cent., then, in addition to the regular duty, a penalty of 20 per cent. is added. It should be stated that the importer may himself add on his entry to make his appreciation of market and dutiable value; but the collector can under no circumstances take duty on less than the entered value, no matter how much less the appraiser reports the real value at the date of exportation. Add to all this intricacy and technicality the further fact that if the invoice is erroneous or false within the knowledge of the owner, consignee, or agent, the whole is forfeited, and we see how well the entire thing is arranged to entrap the unwary and to enable avaricious and grasping officials to prey upon the purses and trifle with the reputations of honest men. Let me read from one of the chapters of this record of labyrinths. For example, if merchandise is manufactured in the interior of Germany, and sent therefrom to the United States through France, and put on ship-board at Havre, which is the country and the time of exportation? If, when the merchandise left Germany, its real destination was New York, is the cost of transportation and other expenses to the frontier of that country a dutiable item? And if so, is the cost of transportation and other expenses incurred after the merchandise leaves the borders of Germany to the port of shipment a dutiable item? The first section of the law of March 3, 1863, says that an invoice of manufactured goods sent here by the manufacturer need only contain "the actual market value thereof at the time and place when and where the same were procured or manufactured." There is no requirement in regard to items of packing or envelopes, as would ordinarily be embraced in the case of purchased goods, which are usually delivered to the purchaser ready for shipment. As will be seen, if an importer having actually paid, or, being subject to the payment of such items, withholds them from his entry by accident or design, the invoice is held to be false and the whole is liable to forfeiture.

Early in the present session I introduced a bill having for its single object the changing of the law which forfeits a whole invoice for the undervaluation of one item. It passed this body some time ago, but I believe it still lingers in the House of Representatives.

Again, when the merchandise arrives in New York, who, if any one, shall add on the entry the dutiable items specified in the ninth section of the act of 1866? Is it the business of the importer or of the collector upon the report of the appraiser? The law does not say; and yet this section indicates that such additions, whether made by one or the other, shall be regarded as a part of the value of the merchandise. Was ever labyrinth more completely devised? And all this not in the interest of legitimate commerce and honest collection of revenue, but rather to advance the opportunities for espionage and greed.

It should be borne in mind that the penalty of 20 per cent., or one-fifth of the whole value in one case, and the entire value in the other, does not necessarily involve any element of fraud. The importer may be wholly innocent in each instance. It may be, and no doubt generally is, trivial omission, careless neglect, want of precise information, or disagreement of opinion between the importer and the final appraisement. It will not do to say that the merchant may go into court on the matter of so-called false invoice, because the burden of proof is at once upon him to show want of knowledge. In other words, he is asked to prove a negative, which is always a very difficult thing to do. Hence the compromise, of which we hear so much, and in the light of which we have further illustration of the villainous practices under cover of vicious laws. By compromise I mean a sort of trade, between the officers and the special agent of the Government on the one hand and the importer on the other, not to bring the case to trial if a certain amount of money is paid. Of course, the power to fix terms and enforce compliance is all on the side of the former. They hold up the law, as was done in a recent memorable case, aided by the great name and influence of one high in the confidence of the Administration; they menace reputation; they arrest the wheels of business, and threaten a still larger draught upon the purse of the unfortunate victim. I need not recite the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co., of Woodruff & Robinson, James E. Colwell & Co., and others, for the facts are familiar to all. It seems clear that, among other reforms, the one relating to compromises should not be overlooked. There should be no compromise until the case is actually tried in court, and then the law of March 3, 1799, affords the proper relief, if any is due, as it enables the Secretary of the Treasury, upon a report by the judge, to discontinue the prosecution upon such terms as may be deemed reasonable and just.

I now come to the authority conferred by the act of March 2, 1867, for the seizure of books and papers, without which the power to enforce a settlement or compromise upon terms to suit the customs officers would not have been so certain. This extraordinay plenary license was needed to round off the system of extortion and plunder which now rises before us with its guilty record. The enormous moiety profits to officers and agents during the last few years would not have been wholly successful without it. But so well is the wanton and cruel character of this act understood, that I need not discuss it at length. It is almost enough to say that such mode of procedure was unknown to the legislation or judicial process of this country until March 2, 1867, and that the intelligent public sentiment of the country demands its utter overthrow. If it were capable of demonstration that no revenue could be collected upon imported merchandise without the seizure of a merchant's books and papers in order to obtain evidence against him of fraud upon the revenue, perhaps such a law could be justified as within the constitutional power of Congress. But, thank God, the character of our merchants does not afford the warrant for such extreme and doubtful resort. The Government can hardly afford to pay so great a price for any possible incidental advantage; it cannot bear the cost of being a party to trampling upon the personal rights, the honest accumulations, and the well-earned character of any class of our citizens.

In this connection I want to refer to the abuses of the special agency system, which has become a conspicuous part of the customs service, especially at the port of New York. These officers or agents are of modern growth. Under the law of 1799 and 1846 the Secretary of the Treasury had authority to designate persons to visit the different ports as occasion might require, and inspect the books of the Government officers. These persons were generally clerks of the Treasury Department, who were familiar with custom-house returns and other branches of the service, and in whose fidelity to the public interests the Secretary had confidence. There seems to have been an attempt to clothe persons with additional power in the legislation of March 3, 1863, and July 18, 1866; but it remained for the law of May 12, 1870, to actually create these agents, to establish them as officers of the revenue, and to confer upon them unexampled power. By the act referred to, fifty-three were authorized to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, "to be employed generally, under the direction of the Secretary, in the detection and prevention of fraud on the customs revenue." Under this authority, Jayne, and others of less distinction, have been appointed. These agents are a sort of middlemen between the Secretary and the collectors of the different ports, without local habitation or properly defined functions. They are not responsible for the manner in which they exercise authority, but have a kind of unrestrained prerogative which knows no limit but the exhausted terror which they excite and the well-drained purse which they seek. In other words, they have no well-defined and adequate responsibility. They are simply appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury to the order of superior influence, and I believe report from time to time to some chief in Washington, who is known as the head of the Special Service Bureau. Practically, these special agents constitute an independent and irresponsible body of men, drawing within their charmed circle whatever official co-operation and political influence is found necessary in carrying out their plans. Within the years since this act of 1870, these agents, including other officers who receive six to ten dollars a day, have organized in New York a "bureau of professional informers." As before stated, their ostensible avocation is to detect fraud upon the revenue and violations of law and customs regulations by customs officers.

The service is based upon the theory that the principal officers of the customs are so absorbed in the nourishment of their perquisite-accounts as to neglect their official duties. But, as seen, this perquisite-matter is contagious, and the interest of the agents soon becomes identical in this respect with those officers whose administration they are supposed to watch. So they all join in making the most out of the moiety practice they can. The great power which the act of March 2, 1867, permits these men to exercise, by which the account books and other records and papers of any merchant or firm may be seized and indefinitely detained, renders them a source of dread. Any commercial house is at their mercy. I submit, if these agents have given any evidence of usefulness it has been purchased at too great a price, and it is better, in my judgment, to fall back upon the old law without delay.

In this hurried review of various enactments touching the customs-revenue service I have said very little of the rapacity and fraud which were thus made possible, and which finally, with shameless effrontery, have been almost daily exhibited. And I ought to remark before I proceed to discuss these practices, that bad as these laws are, bad as their possibilities for wrong, there would not be so much to complain of or so much to lament, if the best men were uniformly called to administer them. Even vicious statutes in the hands of men of high tone may not become inadequately severe and oppressive. But, unfortunately, in the offices and chief places of revenue the want of a high condition of intelligence and personal character is frequently manifest. Turn back the civil-service rules to the page upon which is written that every obligation imposed by public trust and private honor shall be discharged with fidelity, and there will be less reason to complain of bad laws. But I proceed, without further comment, to some facts drawn from official documents, which serve to illustrate the evils of the customs service as now administered.

Perhaps the most noticeable feature of the present system is the enormous emoluments of the collectors, naval officers, surveyors, and special agents, and the pernicious practices by which they are obtained. Nearly three-fourths of the importations of the country are entered at the port of New York, and in treating of the practice and effect there, I shall best present the abuses and the wrongs of the system itself, as the principle involved applies alike to all other customs districts. The officers receive a certain fixed salary, and in addition are entitled to share in the proceeds of fines and penalties imposed or collected in their several districts. The reports of the Secretary of the Treasury of February 11, and March 17, 1874, show that the net amount of money covered into the Treasury from March 1, 1869, to March 1, 1874, out of seizures, fines, penalties, and forfeitures at the port of New York, was $2,191,095.53; that of this amount the moieties paid the collector, naval officer, and surveyor at that port were $500,108.65. It will be seen upon examination that of the amount received into the Treasury there still remains undistributed to these officers and informers the one-half of $166,842.01, to say nothing of the cases in court, in process of compromise, &c., which will greatly swell this sum; for it is true that these reports do not give the full collections into, and distribution in moieties from, the Treasury during the five years which they purport to embrace. The explanation is this: The money received at the Treasury on this moiety account from the 1st of March, 1869, which had been paid to the collector before that time, but not covered by warrant until subsequently, has not been accounted for in these reports; nor have the sums which had been paid to the collector prior to March 1, 1870, for which warrants had not been drawn. So the statement is short at both ends. To illustrate with a single case, take that of Weld & Co., Boston, who agreed to pay $400,000. The amount was to be paid in installments of $100,000 each. The last $100,000 I assume had not been paid in when the report was made up, as it nowhere appears to their credit. In this way other sums, great and small, go to swell the colossal perquisites of these officers, agents, and informers, but which cannot be accurately known to us from any report yet made.

It is one of the peculiarities of the system that not only is the compensation excessively large, but so exceedingly indefinite that we must in some measure depend upon estimates. So complicated is this perquisite-account, with its unsettled cases, pending compromises, suits in court, &c., that no abstract for a definite period gives a correct idea of the real interest of these officers, and at ports where frequent changes have been made the difficulty of obtaining actual amounts is increased. But there is no doubt that the principal officers and the special agent at the port of New York receive from $50,000 to $75,000 per annum each. Even the sums exhibited by these reports for the past five years are colossal, and must strike the plain people of the country with surprise and alarm. Why should these persons each withdraw from the Treasury and the pockets of merchants, annually, more than the combined salaries of the Supreme Court bench? Why should they have more than is paid to the President, his Cabinet, and the judges of the Supreme Court united? These monstrous sums are permitted to these persons in violation of the plain requirements of republican simplicity, economy, and honor. But scandalous as these facts and influences have been in the immediate past, they may be, unless arrested at once, exceeded in the future, when, extending farther upward as well as farther downward, all the sources of patronage become tainted. The avidity for these lucrative positions engenders corruption in their pursuit; the vast and increasing emoluments attract the unprincipled; the enormous power of this political patronage is readily seized upon by the unscrupulous political leader; and every insidious device and corrupt stratagem is employed to retain this coveted wealth, political influence, and power.

But to return. It may be urged that as the responsibility of seizures and suits rests upon the collector of customs, he ought to be compensated for the risk. If this were so, it is evident that the naval officer and surveyor, who do not share this risk, cannot plead the necessity for such protection; but, even as regards the collector, the plea is specious, as there exists no record that any such officer ever suffered pecuniary loss through such responsibility. The courts have never refused a certificate of "probable cause," and if they ever should, an over-zealous officer would find protection in the sympathies of special legislation. No, it is the Government that is finally responsible.

But there are reasons for the abolition of the system of moieties which lie deeper in principle and affect more seriously the public service than even the matter of immense perquisites to these officials. It gives them such an interest in frauds upon the revenue that their advantage is found in the continued existence of frauds rather than in their complete suppression. In fact, it is their interest, to a certain extent, to encourage the infraction of law and to treat occasional detection with such a degree of leniency as will afford the largest official emolument without deterring others from similar practices. One of the well-grounded complaints made against the custom-house officers is, that they are induced by moieties to overlook frauds in the act of perpetration in order to secure their moieties by subsequent detection and threatened punishment. In other words, these officials think more of detection than of prevention, to both of which every collector, at least, is bound by his oath of office. I have had reported to me well-authenticated instances where collectors, although required by the first section of the act of 1863 to prevent the entry of merchandise upon a false or incorrect entry, have permitted goods to be falsely or erroneously entered, while the collector was pursuing to forfeiture entries made under precisely similar circumstances and having similar faults.

Let us look at the evidence bearing upon this point as brought out by an examination of one of the Secretary's previous reports. The case would be still more startling if I could ascertain and present the precise facts for the last three years. But the recent reports are so irregular and complex as to date of payment of the fines, &c., and the distribution thereof, that I am unable, without giving more time than I can now command, to work out and place before you the worse condition. Going back a little, then, from the 1st of January, 1868, to the 1st of December, 1870, there were detected in the several customs districts of the country twenty-nine hundred and eleven cases of smuggling. In one hundred and ninety-nine of these, the cases were settled without suit; in eighteen hundred and thirty-three cases, the goods were seized and sold without suit, and the offenders allowed to go free; in seven hundred and thirty-one, the goods were released and returned to the smugglers upon payment of the appraised value; fifteen were compromised; and in only one hundred and thirty-three were the goods sold by decree of court, and the offending parties not otherwise punished. During the same period there were fourteen hundred and eighty-four cases of fraud and crime, violations of the various sections imposing fines, penalties, and punishments, as found in the laws of 1793, 1799, 1823, and 1866, and for the importation of goods in illegal packages and undervaluations. Of this number, thirteen hundred and thirty-six were settled without suit; in seventy two, the goods were released to the violators of the law on payment of the value thereof to the collector; eighteen cases of undervaluation, involving the payment of over $100,000, were compromised; and seventy-two were disposed of by decree of court. It thus appears that out of all the cases of smuggling and other fraudulent and illegal practices upon the customs revenue which were detected during this period of nearly three years, rising to the startling number of forty-three hundred and ninety-five, there were only one hundred and ninety-one of them that ever went into court, even for civil prosecution. This leaves forty-two hundred and four, as will be seen, which were settled, compromised, or the goods disposed of by those who had an immediate interest in the proceeds to be obtained in one way and another by reason of the moieties which they could secure. It seems to me there can be but one answer to all this, and that is an unqualified condemnation and destruction of the system and practice which are made to palliate fraud and extenuate crime.

It will be seen by a glance at the two recent reports of the Secretary of the Treasury that they do not contain information of the offense charged against the person defrauding the revenue, nor of the manner the money was recovered by the Treasury. Could the cases embraced in these reports have been grouped and presented, as in the previous report to which I have referred, and which was in response to my own resolution of inquiry, they would have added great force to the many reasons that exist for destroying this vicious moiety business. For instance, any one who will take the trouble to examine the tables of the Secretary in these recent reports will find that in the whole list of over thirty-five hundred cases there is no trace of a single compromise. The marginal reference is always, "seizure sold," "fines paid," "released on payment of value," or "proceeds distributed under order of the court." But it is notorious that cases are compromised almost every day, as with Phelps, Dodge & Co., and Woodruff & Robinson, and yet the penalties are made to appear on the record to which I refer as having been imposed by a court.

It will be found upon further inquiry that at the port of New York from March 4, 1870, to March 4, 1874, there were thirty-five hundred and forty seven seizures, penalties, fines, and forfeitures altogether, and that out of this number there appears to have been no criminal proceeding against any one; at least, it is not shown that one out of this multitude has ever been convicted. In the light of the late disclosures, it is more than probable that the great majority of the cases were worked up by the suborning use of money and the oppression of officials; and the large sums paid in settlement were in many instances to secure immunity from persecution; to avoid the destruction of business; injury to reputation, and sometimes absolute ruin. It will turn out, I suppose, upon due inquiry, that where there existed guilty intent to defraud the revenue more lenity was shown than to the honest merchant who was liable only on account of a technical forfeiture, if at all, for the reason that it is to the advantage of the revenue officials that smuggling and fraud should not be seriously checked. In effect, they say, let it go on. The upright merchant could not be counted on to return to the snare, but the rogue who had been allowed to profit by his crimes would be likely to come again and again, and add alike to their swelling coffers. Just as it is obvious that large gains come from fines and seizures, it is plainly for the interest of the revenue officials that there should be frauds to discover and seizures to make, and so you see they do not attack smuggling very earnestly, which is one great source of supply. But from the merchant who pursues a legitimate trade and who has a reputation at stake, it will do to take the uttermost farthing; it is probably the last chance with him. Indeed almost the first business of the special agent is to find out how much the merchant is able to pay, and on that basis to propose a compromise. The extent of the wrong to the Government has very little bearing upon the terms of settlement; but rather the length of the purse on one hand and private rapacity on the other, are the principal factors in the case.

Mr. President, keeping in mind the distinction between the raising of money upon importations for the use of the Government, and the means employed for the attainment of that end, to which I adverted in my opening remarks, it must be admitted that the facts I have stated bear with gravity upon each branch of the inquiry. It is said that history repeats itself. For the credit of our Government and the cause of humanity generally I trust that many of the worst phases as presented in the course of previous civilizations will not reappear in our more advanced state. I do not see, however, that the avarice of man, his greed for gain, and the tendency to trench upon the rights and property of others, has greatly changed. At all events, these types of character, with varying and offensive pretense, every now and then exhibit themselves as painfully illustrated in the subject of my discussion. It will be seen by a careful reading of history not very far back, that the disposition to divert the revenues of governments to personal and private ends, is a frequent menace to their integrity and stability. In the light of the Sanborn contracts, Jayne raids, and moiety practices, let us turn over a page or two of the past and read.

To find the best parallel in the career of any government to the venality and personal and political scandal developed in the moiety system, we must go to the most corrupt and oppressive period of the French monarchy. In the middle of the seventeenth century (Louis XIV being king) we are told by Henri Martin in his history of France, that spoliation of the revenue and the people was effected by a league between the Government and the farmers of the revenue. There sprang up under the administration of the finance minister, Foquet, a system of taxation which involved the pocketing of moieties by a class of favored middle-men standing between the treasury and the people, to take toll of both. The merchants of France were no longer consulted as to imposts or import duties, but the farmers of the revenue were taken into the counsels of the administration as to every change in the revenue laws and regulations. Informers and spies spread themselves over every commercial community, setting traps to catch the thoughtless and unwary. In 1664, the lowest duty on importations was 25 per cent. ad valorem, while many articles paid more than 100 per cent. At the same time, the taxes on domestic articles were never so high before. The tax upon salt, a necessary article of universal consumption, amounted to no less than 36,000,000 francs per annum. But of this enormous revenue the farmers-general, who collected it, paid to the king only 19,000,000 francs. The remaining 17,000,000 represented their expenses, commissions, and profits, or the moiety of her treasury parasites. These evils, at last, by their excess laid the foundation for their own cure. Protests and complaints went up from the merchants of Paris and from the provinces. The cost of conducting the government annually, through the combined increase of expenditure and the robbery of the treasury by the moiety system, grew to a sum equal to 2,000,000,000 francs at the present day. At last, through the powerful influence of the great reformer, Colbert, encouraged and sustained by the merchants and the patriotic people, the entire system was abolished and the whole ring of public robbers were thrown into dismay. The people applauded these vigorous measures, and firmly supported every movement for reform. Financiers and speculators on the revenue were brought to trial, and the amount of fines and penalties in turn imposed upon these farmers of the revenue reached the enormous sum of 110,000,000 francs.

Is not this almost an exact counterpart of our own case? Do we not here see enormous contributions levied upon the revenues and the people? Is not official morality depreciated, and are not practices justified which tend to extensive depravity in public and private life? Do not middle-men and moiety-hunters, under contract from the Government and with its sanction, go forth to prey upon the public revenues and upon merchants and others, in almost every commercial community? It is this series of illegal and dishonest offenses against the moral sense of the country that makes the parallel from the French record so striking. May not our indignant people also at last turn upon the guilty officials and their hardly less guilty political accomplices in power and condemn them to like obloquy and scorn? It is not too much to say that these things at least have added reproach to the party in power; have impaired its enviable prestige; and will serve to weigh it down, unless it shall immediately and forever renounce the alliance. This, I fear, it will not have the courage to do in good faith and heartily. The long silence here and elsewhere upon matters affecting the interests, the reputation, and the welfare of the whole people, and especially in our great commercial city, is significant. It is not for me to call in question the motives of any one outside of those political considerations which all may understand and which are properly the subject of public remark. But it is a painful fact that no upbraiding word, no lesson of reproof, no apparent condemnation has come from any influential public authority. Nor is it to be denied that at the port of New York officers have been appointed without reference to qualifications and character; faithful and efficient subordinates have been abased by the appointment over them of incompetent men, and promotions have not depended upon merit, but upon political influence. In other words, it is generally believed that the patronage of the Government is used as a reward for partisan service and as an agency for promoting personal ends. Looking to the safety and honor of the nation, we cannot be indifferent to the least tendency toward partisan perversion in the bestowment of office, nor permit the insidious conduct of officials to mutilate the integrity of the public service. The higher the officer or the influence in default or in defiance, the more necessary to guard the power he wields and resent every outcrop of abuse. To the thriving citizen these things appeared trivial at first, forgetful of the terrible results to which they were tending. But we must at last meet the question, the question of searching and thorough reform, or the pernicious brood of corrupting influences which have been warmed into power will in the end be too strong for us to grapple with and overthrow. I do not speak as one having nothing better than hopeless complaint, but in sober warning and earnest entreaty.

I submit that the laws should be at once reformed, and that those who hold positions under the Government should be upright and faithful servants. I desire that they be incited to the utmost fidelity to the public interests, rather than to the public servant who discharges an official responsibility in appointing or nominating them. I plead in the name of the people for the adoption of a purer system of customs service, under which the Government and the merchant shall be upon the same level. I plead for the repeal of laws which destroy all respect for law, for the abandonment of practices in official life which tend to lessen our respect for official character and to impair the sense of mercantile honor. In a word, I plead for the Senate to take up the bill now and too long past in the hands of the Committee on Commerce, or some other bill which will accomplish as much in the way of these deeply needed reforms.

I have passed over, as will be seen, some of the business features of the bill, but if I have impressed Senators with the duty of proceeding to its consideration, I have accomplished all I intended at this time. I can conceive of but few subjects of paramount importance, and none that now presses upon us with such fatal experience and force.

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire what legislation may be necessary for the protection of the peninsula from depredations and the harbor of Erie from detriment, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions for printing and reference having been concluded, the States will now be called for resolutions for action.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. DUELL submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to pay the clerk of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, &c., from the day when he entered upon his duties.

HOMESTEADS FOR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. NEGLEY submitted the following resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and is hereby, instructed to prepare a bill to amend the act relating to soldiers and sailors' homesteads, passed June 8, 1872, so as to allow honorably discharged soldiers and sailors, their widows and orphan children, to acquire homesteads of the public lands of the United States without being required to commence settlement and improvements on said lands.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that that resolution be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, as that Committee has the subject now under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] is entitled under this call to test the sense of the House upon his resolution by the previous question.

The question was upon seconding the previous question; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. Then I rise to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will go over under the rule.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. O'BRIEN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3252) to remove the legal and political disabilities of George N. Hollins, of Maryland; which was read three times and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. ARCHER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3253) to remove the legal and political disabilities of Richard T. Allison, of Maryland; which was read three times, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3254) to relieve the persons therein named (E. L. Winder and A. W. Stark, of Norfolk, Virginia) of their legal and political disabilities; which was read three times, and passed, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

TAX ON LEAF TOBACCO.

Mr. VANCE submitted the following preamble and resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Whereas the tax on leaf tobacco is an unjust discrimination between the products of the farmer in the tobacco-growing region and the non-tobacco-producing sections, causing inequalities in taxation; and whereas the fines and penalties imposed by the internal-revenue laws for violations thereof are in many instances entirely disproportionate to the offense committed, causing much trouble and suffering in the country because no discretion is left to the courts: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be, and they are hereby, instructed to bring into this House at an early day a bill which shall provide for repealing the tax on leaf tobacco, or change the character of the fines and penalties for violations of the laws, leaving the same to the discretion of the courts, and which shall forbid the destruction of the property of persons violating said laws upon prima facie evidence without trial and conviction.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman to change his resolution from one of instruction to one directing the committee to inquire into the expediency of the proposed legislation.

Mr. VANCE. I prefer a vote directly upon the resolution.

The question was upon seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. VANCE and Mr. DAWES were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 40, noes not counted.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. VANCE. I will modify the resolution as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BECK. I rise to move a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules comes over from Monday fortnight, submitted by the gentleman from Montana, [Mr. MAGINNIS.]

ASSAY OFFICE AT HELENA, MONTANA.

The motion of Mr. MAGINNIS was to suspend the rules and pass a bill to establish an assay office at Helena, in the Territory of Montana.

The question was upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

The motion was seconded, and the rules were suspended, two-thirds voting in favor thereof, and the bill (H. R. No. 3255) was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, requested the return of a bill passed by the Senate on the 1st instant, entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled 'An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River.'"

INDIAN DISBURSEMENTS.

Mr. BECK. I move to suspend the rules to adopt the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it shall be in order, when the Indian appropriation bill now pending in Committee of the Whole is being considered therein, to move as amendments thereto the following:

1. That the proviso in the first section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1873, and for other purposes," approved May 29, 1872, which reads as follows: "That any member of the board of Indian commissioners is hereby empowered to investigate the contracts, expenditures, and accounts in connection with the Indian service, and shall have access to all books and papers relating thereto in any Government office, but the examination of vouchers and accounts by the executive committee of said board shall not be a prerequisite of payment," be repealed, and the provisions of law relating to the powers and duties of said commissioners in force previous to the passage of said proviso are hereby declared to be in full force.

2. That all payments of annuities, bounties, interest on stocks, bonds, or other funds, and all sums which are to be disbursed in the discretion of the President to the various Indian tribes by the provisions of the act shall be paid and disbursed by such officers of the Army of the United States as the President may designate for that purpose. Said officers shall be required to make detailed statements of such disbursements, which shall be reported to Congress by the Secretary of War at the opening of each session of Congress and at such other times as Congress may direct.

The question being on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, tellers were ordered; and Mr. AVERILL and Mr. BECK were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 66.

So the motion was seconded.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the motion to suspend the rules.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 91, noes 54.

Mr. BECK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHANKS. Mr. Speaker, cannot the question on this resolution be divided?

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules is not divisible.

Mr. SHANKS. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] will divide the proposition, so as to let us vote on the two questions separately.

Mr. BECK. I believe I will let the resolution stand as it is. The House, if it chooses, can vote it down.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 91, nays 108, not voting 91; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Barrere, Beck, Begole, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Caldwell, John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Crossland, Darrall, Dunnell, Durham, Eldredge, Field, Fort, Freeman, Giddings, Glover, Hagans, Hamilton, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Havens, Hereford, Hurlbut, Kasson, Kendall, Knapp, Lamar, Lamison, Lansing, Lawrence, Leach, Luttrell, Marshall, Martin, McCrary, MacDougall, Merriam, Milliken, Mills, Moore, Morey, Morrison, Nesmith, Niblack, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, Hosea W. Smith, Snyder, Sprague, Starkweather, St. John, Sypher, Christopher Y. Thomas, Todd, Townsend, Tyner, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, Wheeler, Whiteley, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, William Williams, William B. Williams, and James Wilson—108.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Banning, Barnum, Barry, Berry, Bowen, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crocker, Crooke, Curtis, Davis, DeWitt, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Hancock, Harmer, Hathorn, Hays, Herndon, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Holman, Hooper, Hunton, Hyde, Hynes, Killinger, Lofland, Magee, Maynard, James W. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Sloss, Small, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, William A. Smith, Stanard, Standiford, Stephens, Stowell, Strawbridge, Swann, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Tremain, Waddell, Wallace, White, Whitehouse, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, John M. S. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wood, Woodford, and Woodworth—91.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the motion to suspend the rules was not agreed to.

SANBORN CONTRACTS, ETC.

Mr. FOSTER. The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom were referred the several communications of the Secretary of the Treasury in answer to the resolution of this House of February 13, 1874, calling upon him to transmit to the House "copies of all contracts made under the authority of the Treasury Department in pursuance of one of the provisions of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill approved May 8, 1872, and also copies of all schedules and correspondence and orders of the Department relating to said contracts, and also the amount of money paid in under said contracts, and by whom and under which contract paid," have directed me to submit a report.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman desire?

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to have some early day fixed for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman make?

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the report and bill (H. R. No. 3256) be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Ways and Means, with the right to report it back at any time for consideration in the House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

REORGANIZATION OF THE LAND OFFICE.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to suspend the rules so that the bill (H. R. No. 1060) entitled "An act to reorganize the clerical force of the General Land Office" be made the special order as in Committee of the Whole for May 13, at half past one o'clock p. m., to the exclusion of all other orders except appropriation bills, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. DAWES. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not propose to put that business before reports coming from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask for a vote of the House on the proposition.

Mr. KELLOGG. Let me ask the Chair a question. This does not put any previous special orders behind it? I ask the Chair for an answer.

The SPEAKER. It does not.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee on Ways and Means expect to be called to-morrow morning, when they will report matters to go to the Committee of the Whole, matters of the greatest importance, and to put them behind this special order is a thing I hardly think the gentleman from Pennsylvania would ask to be done. Therefore, unless in this order reports from the Committee on Ways and Means are excepted, I hope the House will not grant the request.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I except reports from the Committee on Ways and Means as well as reports from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me ask whether this reorganization is confined to the Land Office? If so, I should like to know why it is not proposed to carry the reorganization through the whole Department. I do not believe it is the right course to adopt, to make this reorganization by piecemeal.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is all I have charge of.

Mr. NEGLEY. I wish to make an inquiry, whether this special order, if made, will take precedence of other special orders, and especially special orders coming from the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. TOWNSEND'S proposition, as modified, was again read.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask the gentleman to except the special order made for May 17 of the bill reported from the Committee on Commerce to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam."

The SPEAKER. If the House adopt this as the gentleman has modified it, it will take precedence of everything but reports from the Committee on Ways and Means and reports from the Committee on Appropriations and previous special orders worded in the same manner. A mere special order like that to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] refers would of course be brushed aside if this order be made.

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope, then, that the House will not agree to any such proposition.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask for a vote.

The question recurred on seconding the motion for a suspension of the rules.

The House divided; and there were ayes 27, noes not counted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will except the bill the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers to.

Mr. DAWES. As the gentleman has excepted the reports of the Ways and Means Committee, it may perhaps seem ungracious in me to suggest anything further in opposition. Nevertheless I feel I ought to say that in my judgment this course of proceeding will very much entangle the business of the House. The final adjournment will be put off to a much later day than it ought to be by this constant increase of special orders. I do not wish unnecessarily to antagonize the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I would suggest to gentlemen who have the current business of the House before them that the making of special orders during this session has been much more numerous than during any other session I have ever known.

Mr. COBURN. I ask also that the Army bill be excepted.

Mr. BRADLEY. I hope there will be no further objection to this proposition. The Land Office ought to be reorganized. We have already lost one valuable man in that department because of the inadequate salary provided for the Commissioner.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to make any remark touching this which would seem to apply to any particular bill, but he cannot help warning the House the multiplication of special orders will so entangle the business that it will be almost next to impossible to proceed intelligibly. If the gentleman will get his bill in the House and try the sense of the House on a suspension of the rules, that is a definite mode of proceeding; but if special orders are multiplied it will be impossible, simply impossible, to go on with them, and gentlemen will be disappointed in their expectation of reaching them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I withdraw my proposition, and now give notice that on Monday next after the morning hour I will ask a suspension of the rules on the passage of the bill to which I have referred.

DUTIES ON FRUIT AND FRUIT-PLANTS.

Mr. KASSON. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Ways and Means the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2191) in relation to the customs duties on imported fruits, with an amendment on which I ask the action of the House at this time. It will take but a moment.

There was no objection.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Except in cases where suits in court have been discontinued by instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the error in the punctuation of the clause relating to fruit-plants, in the fifth section of the act approved June 6, 1872, entitled "An act to reduce duties on imports and to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," of inserting a comma instead of a hyphen after the word "fruit" is hereby corrected; and said clause shall read as follows: "Fruit-plants, tropical and semi-tropical, for the purpose of propagation or cultivation."

Mr. KASSON. The Committee on Ways and Means report the following amendment to the amendment of the Senate:

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, The duties imposed by virtue of this amendment shall not be levied or collected on fruits entered for consumption at any port of entry prior to July 1, 1874.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. With the permission of the gentleman from Iowa, I would desire to offer an amendment in relation to a similar subject-matter, namely, the duty on fruit-boxes. If the duty on fruits is changed, the manufacturers of fruit-boxes ought to have the privilege of furnishing, if they can, the markets in this respect; and they ought to have it now, in order that orders going abroad for fruits may be accompanied by American-manufactured boxes in which the fruits can come back. It will make no difference in the internal revenue.

Mr. KASSON. I have only to say that that question is, in connection with other matters, before the Committee on Ways and Means now, and I have no doubt will be provided for. But I have no authority to attach a new subject to this bill, and I hope it will not be done here.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Will the gentleman allow me to offer it as an amendment, providing simply that the boxes which go out for these fruits may come back free of duty? I hope the gentleman will allow me to offer this for the action of the House. I do not antagonize the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I have no authority from the committee to admit any such amendment. The amendment I have offered is all that has been considered by the committee in connection with this bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman from Iowa inform the House whether the bill in the shape he proposes provides for a judicial decision at any time under the original law?

Mr. KASSON. The bill as originally passed provided for the way a judicial decision should be obtained. That is not changed by the Senate.

The question being taken, the amendment reported by the Committee on Ways and Means was adopted.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICTS IN KANSAS.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 203) to create two additional land districts in the State of Kansas, and that the bill be now put on its passage.

The bill was read. It provides for establishing two additional land districts in the State of Kansas, to be called the western land district and the Arkansas Valley land district.

Mr. SPEER. The other day when this bill was offered I objected to its passage; but on the explanations made to me by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PHILLIPS] of the necessity for its passage, I shall not object this morning.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PHILLIPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELIAS C. BOUDINOT.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask that, by unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 826) for the relief of Elias C. Boudinot, with an amendment by the Senate, be taken from the Speaker's table, and that the Senate amendment be concurred in.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "dismissed," in line 4, to the end of the bill; so that it will read:

That the civil proceedings now pending in the name of the United States against the property claimed by the said Elias C. Boudinot, for alleged violations of the internal-revenue laws, be discontinued and dismissed.

Mr. SPEER. I ask that the portion which it is proposed to strike out may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that the property seized and taken from him, and the gross proceeds of the sale of any such property, on account of alleged violations of said laws, be returned and restored to him by the proper officers of the Government: Provided, That taxes legally due from and unpaid by said Boudinot, in respect to the business, shall have first been paid or deducted from the proceeds aforesaid.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask concurrence in the amendment of the Senate.

The question being taken, the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. ELDREDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. G. FELL ET AL.

Mr. LANSING, by unanimous consent, presented a report of the minority of the Committee on Claims on the bill (H. R. No. 63) entitled "A bill for the relief of J. G. Fell, Edward Hookes, and George Burnham, trustees;" and moved that it be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, authorized to report upon the bankrupt bill at any time for consideration in the House, not to take precedence of reports of the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations or previous orders.

The motion for suspending the rules was seconded, the rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the resolution was adopted.

DEBTS DUE FROM STATE RAILROADS, ETC.

Mr. MAYNARD. Upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union are two bills reported the other morning from the Committee on the Judiciary. The reports are numbered 100 and 101. One is the bill (H. R. No. 1938) to extend the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of debts due from southern railroads, and for other purposes." The other is the bill (H. R. No. 1937) for the relief of the State of Tennessee, and is cognate to the bill No. 1938.

This involves the interests of several southern railroads, and it is very desirable, in regard to all those roads, that whatever action may be had shall be had with some promptness. My request of the House is that they will allow on Friday of this week the two bills to be considered after the reading of the Journal, and I pledge myself, and ask that the pledge be put in the form of a limitation, that no more time shall be consumed than is necessary for the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] who reported the bills from the committee, to explain their character to the House, and then submit them for passage. If the House should not be satisfied after such explanation, why, I will abide by its decision.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope we shall not block up the way. We have but one appropriation bill in the Senate.

Mr. MAYNARD. I only ask a short time for the consideration of these bills. I am willing to limit it to one hour.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to ask the gentleman what will become of his bills if they are not passed before the hour expires?

Mr. MAYNARD. Why, let them go and take their chance.

Mr. COBURN. They will be right in the way of every other bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. O, no; they will stand where they are on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that the two bills to which he has referred be considered in the House, immediately after the reading of the Journal on Friday next, for one hour. If the House does not second the demand for the previous question upon them before the expiration of that hour, they will remain on the Calendar where they now are. Is there any objection to that arrangement?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I object.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the rules be suspended and that arrangement made.

On seconding the motion to suspend the rules there were—ayes 94, noes 35.

So the motion was seconded.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the order was made.

SALE OF UNSERVICEABLE ORDNANCE STORES.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent of the House, by the direction of the Committee on Appropriations, to have passed a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to sell unserviceable ordnance stores, and for other purposes.

The bill was read for information. It authorizes the Secretary of War from and after its passage to cause to be sold, in such manner and at such times and places and in such quantities as shall most conduce to the interests of the United States, all obsolete and unserviceable fixed ammunition and leaden balls and the surplus pig-lead in excess of two thousand tons, now stored in the various arsenals of the United States, and to cause the net proceeds of such sales, after paying all costs and expenses of breaking up and preparing said ammunition for sale and all necessary expenses of such sale, including the cost of transportation to the place of sale, to be covered into the Treasury of the United States, with full accounts of said expenses.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire simply to say that in working up the Army appropriation bill I found that the Department had sixteen years' supply of lead on hand, and I thought $1,000,000 worth of it might well be sold and the proceeds covered into the Treasury. In this connection I submit a letter from the Secretary of War in reference to this bill.

The letter of the Secretary of War is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, February 20, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that a careful consideration has been given to the memorandum referred by you to the Ordnance Bureau of this Department, suggesting the propriety of disposing at public sale of a large part of the surplus stock of lead on hand at the several United States arsenals.

An investigation into the quantities on hand shows the aggregates as follows: New pig-lead, 8,207 tons; remelted lead, 1,302 tons.

The remelted lead has been condemned for use in the manufacture of ammunition, and is sold in quantities at stated intervals under existing laws.

The new pig-lead is serviceable, but at present rate of consumption in the manufacture of ammunition, and for other purposes, (about 500 tons a year,) the whole stock of 8,200 tons will last for at least sixteen years. This stock is composed of foreign brands uniformly bringing in the markets a higher price than our domestic product. The American lead is stated to be for all domestic purposes except corroding as good as the foreign; and as the vast mineral regions of the West have yielded a continually increasing quantity since 1870, materially reducing the importations of the foreign article, it is reasonable to infer that all our supplies for both domestic and military purposes will ultimately be drawn from our own soil. Meanwhile should a public emergency demand an increase of production as to quality or quantity, it might readily be accomplished by stimulating that branch of industry.

The foreign lead on hand will probably bring more to-day than at any time in the future, owing to the increasing competition on the part of the domestic article, and the stock, if disposed of now, could be easily replaced at a saving to the United States.

I have to recommend that, reserving for current uses the new lead which is on hand at the Benicia arsenal, California; Rock Island arsenal, Illinois; Frankford arsenal, Pennsylvania, and New York arsenal, New York, amounting to about 2,700 tons, the remainder at the other arsenals, say about 5,500 tons, be sold in quantities not greater than 500 tons at any one purchase.

As this lead is serviceable and not unsuitable for the military service, it is not covered by existing laws authorizing sales, and authority for its disposition must be obtained from Congress. The memorandum is returned as requested.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Hon. W. A. WHEELER,
House of Representatives.

Mr. COBURN. I object to that bill.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the rules be suspended and the bill passed.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question was then taken on suspending the rules; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill (H. R. No. 3257) was passed.

CONTAGIOUS OR INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

Mr. BROMBERG. I move that the rules be suspended and the bill (H. R. No. 2887) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States be passed. I will state that the bill comes from the Committee on Commerce now unanimously.

The bill was read.

Mr. MERRIAM. I would ask the gentleman from Alabama whether the member of the committee from New York was present when he says there was a unanimous vote in favor of this bill?

Mr. BROMBERG. The chairman of the committee agreed to the report; at least I so understood.

Mr. TREMAIN. I hope the gentleman will not press this bill now in the absence of my colleague, [Mr. COX.] It has been voted down once.

The question was put on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and on a division there were—ayes 13, noes 43; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BROMBERG and Mr. TREMAIN were appointed.

Mr. BROMBERG. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] will agree that this bill shall be considered on Monday next, I will not press it now.

Mr. TREMAIN. My colleague [Mr. COX] who has charge of this subject is absent, and I do not know how long he will remain absent. The bill has been voted down once already.

Mr. BROMBERG. As the gentleman from New York insists on his opposition, I withdraw the bill.

ENOCH JACOBS.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3158) for the relief of Enoch Jacobs, United States consul at Montevideo; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended and that the following resolution be adopted:

Resolved, That on and after Tuesday, the 5th instant, and until further ordered, the daily sessions of this House shall begin at eleven o'clock a. m.

The question was put on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and on a division there were—ayes 74, noes 42; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, and Mr. DAWES were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 101, noes 53.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was upon suspending the rules and passing the order.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, and Mr. DAWES were again appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 80, noes 70; not two-thirds in the affirmative.

Before the result of this vote was announced, Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were—ayes 21, noes 93; not one-fifth in the affirmative.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I call for tellers upon ordering the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers; and there were 35 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of a quorum) tellers were ordered; and Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, and Mr. SPEER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 45, noes not counted.

So, the affirmative being one-fifth of the last vote, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 141, nays 78, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albright, Atkins, Banning, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Biery, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Burrows, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, John B. Clark, jr., Clayton, Clements, Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corwin, Crounse, Curtis, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Duell, Durham, Field, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Giddings, Gooch, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Parsons, Pendleton, Perry, Pierce, Pike, Poland, Ransier, Rapier, Ray, Rice, Richmond, Robbins, Ross, Sawyer, Henry B. Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Sheldon, Sherwood, Sloan, Small, A. Herr Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, Snyder, Southard, Sprague, Starkweather, St. John, Stone, Storm, Strait, Swann, Sypher, Christopher Y. Thomas, Todd, Tremain, Tyner, Vance, Waldron, Walls, Jasper D. Ward, Wells, Wheeler, Whitehead, Whiteley, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, John M. S. Williams, Willie, James Wilson, Wolfe, Woodworth, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—141.

NAYS—Messrs. Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Bradley, Bromberg, Burchard, Roderick R. Butler, Cessna, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Conger, Cotton, Crossland, Crutchfield, Davis, Dawes, Donnan, Dunnell, Eames, Eldredge, Farwell, Fort, Gunckel, Hamilton, Benjamin W. Harris, Joseph R. Hawley, Hooper, Houghton, Howe, Hubbell, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Lawrence, Lawson, Leach, Lewis, Loughridge, Lowe, Marshall, Maynard, Moore, Morey, Morrison, Niblack, O'Brien, Orr, Orth, Packard, Packer, Pelham, Phelps, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Pratt, Read, Ellis H. Roberts, James W. Robinson, Milton Sayler, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sessions, Shanks, Sheats, Sloss, George L. Smith, Speer, Thornburgh, Townsend, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whitthorne, William Williams, and William B. Williams—78.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Barnum, Barry, Berry, Benjamin F. Butler, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Cox, Creamer, Crittenden, Crocker, Crooke, De Witt, Eden, Elliott, Foster, Glover, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, Hathorn, Hays, Herndon, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hunton, Hynes, Jewett, Killinger, Lofland, Magee, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McJunkin, Mellish, Mitchell, Myers, Neal, Negley, Nesmith, Niles, Potter, Purman, Rainey, Randall, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, Rusk, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, William A. Smith, Stanard, Standiford, Stephens, Stowell, Strawbridge, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Waddell, Wallace, Whitehouse, Wilber, Charles G. Williams, Wilshire, Ephraim K. Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wood, and Woodford—71.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

COMMISSION ON FORESTS.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that the rules be so suspended as to pass the bill (H. R. No. 2497) for the appointment of a commission for inquiry into the destruction of forests and into the measures necessary for the preservation of timber. I will state that this bill has the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on the Public Lands, based upon the message of the President of the United States.

Mr. SPEER. It is the creation of another office.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It is practically the creation of another Bureau in the Departments here.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The question is upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were ayes 47, noes not counted.

So the motion to suspend the rules was not seconded.

SOUTHERN CLAIMS COMMISSION.

Mr. LAMAR. I move that the rules be so suspended as to pass the joint resolution I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, (H. R. No. 94,) as follows:

Whereas a written request, signed by a large number of the members of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America, has been presented to the southern claims commission, in session in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, urging said commission to make a supplementary report to the Congress of the United States of the claims here submitted and decided; and whereas no such report has been made: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the southern claims commission be, and is hereby, instructed to report to Congress without delay all the cases before it in which the proof has been closed prior to April 1, 1874, submitted by the claimants for decision.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Does not that direct the commission to report to Congress not merely the cases they have disposed of, but those in which the proof has been closed?

Mr. LAMAR. It is intended to include those cases which have been finally disposed of by the commission, as well as those in which the final proof has been closed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I do not think that will do.

Mr. MAYNARD. We had a lot of cases reported to us at the beginning of this session, which were referred to the Committee on War Claims, and we have not heard from them since. If they cannot be got further than that we had better stop where we are.

The question was taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and upon a division there were—ayes 54, noes 58.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Before the result of the vote is announced, I desire to suggest to my friend from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] that if he will modify his resolution so as to require the commission to report those cases which have been acted upon by them I think it will be adopted.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Would it not be better to strike out the language requiring the commissioners to report the cases in which the testimony has been closed? Is it not sufficient to require them to report the cases decided by them?

Mr. LAMAR. I will modify the resolution to that effect.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 94) was passed.

Some time thereafter,

Mr. MAYNARD said: I desire to correct a statement which I made a moment since, and which probably has gone into the RECORD. I do not wish to be misrepresented, nor do I wish to put myself in the position of misrepresenting any committee of this House. I was under the impression, and so stated, that the claims reported from the southern claims commission at the beginning of this session had not been acted upon by the Committee on War Claims. My attention has since been called to the fact that that committee have reported a bill on that subject which is now on the Private Calendar.

SOLDIERS OF BLACK HAWK WAR.

Mr. KNAPP submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions are requested to inquire into the expediency of enacting a law granting pensions to the surviving soldiers, their widows and orphans, of the Black Hawk war, and authority is hereby given them to report by bill or otherwise.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO AS A STATE.

Mr. McKEE. I move to suspend the rules to adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill to admit New Mexico as a State be made the special order for the 21st of May, 1874, at half past one o'clock p. m., to the exclusion of all other business except appropriation bills.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I suggest that reports from the Committee on Ways and Means be also excepted.

The SPEAKER. This proposition is confined to a single day. The Chair understands that the Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico [Mr. ELKINS] desires to present his views on that day.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the resolution was adopted.

SALE OF SPIRITUOUS LIQUOR TO INDIANS.

Mr. AVERILL. By direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs I ask unanimous consent to report and put on its passage a bill (H. R. No. 3258) to amend the acts of June 30, 1834, and February 13, 1862, to regulate trade and intercourse with Indians.

The bill was read. It amends the acts named in the title so as to provide that any Indian or Indians who shall exchange, give, barter, or dispose of any spirituous liquor or wine to any Indian shall be subject to the provisions and penalties provided against other persons.

There being no objection, the bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

Mr. AVERILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREE POSTAL DELIVERY.

Mr. TYNER. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That it shall be in order, when the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, shall be under consideration in the Committee of the Whole, to offer and consider an amendment so changing existing laws as to limit the establishment hereafter of the free-delivery system in towns and cities whose population within their corporate limits is not less than twenty thousand.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question recurring on agreeing to the motion, there were—ayes 48, noes 38; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. TYNER and Mr. SOUTHARD were appointed.

Mr. TYNER. I ask unanimous consent to make an explanation of only one minute in regard to the purpose of this resolution.

Mr. CONGER. I object to a statement on one side unless there is to be an opportunity for a statement on the other.

Mr. TYNER. I wish only to explain the resolution, not to debate it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan, as the Chair understands, asks to occupy in reply to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] the same amount of time—one minute.

Mr. TYNER. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, one minute will be granted to each gentleman.

There was no objection.

Mr. TYNER. As the law now stands, the Postmaster-General may establish the free-delivery system in towns and cities where the population within the delivery of the post-office is twenty thousand. Under this provision he is frequently embarrassed and harassed in determining the population within the delivery of a post-office. The object of this resolution is simply to limit the count to the corporate limits of the city or town. It does not propose to change the delivery system in any town or city where it has already been established by order of the Postmaster-General. The design is only to relieve him from embarrassment.

Mr. CONGER. The proposition is evidently intended to take away the free-delivery system as now possessed under the law by cities of ten thousand, fifteen thousand, or nineteen thousand nine hundred population.

Mr. TYNER. I answer that by saying that such cities have not the free-delivery system now by law.

Mr. CONGER. They have it if within the limits of the delivery.

The House divided upon the motion to suspend the rules and agree to the resolution; and there were ayes 94, noes not counted.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the resolution was agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR SYSTEM.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, presented amendments heretofore authorized to be offered to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill when under consideration in Committee of the Whole; which were ordered to be printed.

CATTARAUGUS AND ALLEGANY INDIAN RESERVATIONS, NEW YORK.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. No. 3280) to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, and to confirm existing leases.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all Indians residing within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations in the State of New York shall, for the purposes of this act, be considered and treated as belonging to, and included in, the Seneca Nation of New York Indians.

SEC. 2. That all leases heretofore made by or with the authority of said Seneca Nation of lands within said reservations to railroad corporations are hereby ratified and confirmed; and said Seneca Nation may, in accordance with their laws and form of government, lease lands within said reservations for railroad purposes.

SEC. 3. That the President of the United States shall appoint three commissioners, whose duty it shall be, as soon as may be, to survey, locate, and establish proper boundaries and limits of the villages of Vandalia, Carrollton, Great Valley, Salamanca, West Salamanca, and Red House within said Allegany reservation, including therein, as far as practicable, all lands now occupied by white settlers and such other lands as, in their opinion, may be reasonably required for the purposes of such villages; and they shall cause a return of their doings in writing, together with maps of such surveys and locations duly certified by them, to be filed in the office of the county clerk of the county of Cattaraugus in said State, there to be recorded and preserved. The boundaries of said villages so surveyed, located, and established shall be the limits of said villages for all the purposes of this act.

SEC. 4. That all unexpired leases of land situated within the limits of said villages when established as before provided, in which Indians, or said Seneca Nation, or persons claiming under them, are the lessors, shall be binding upon the parties thereto: Provided, nevertheless, That this act shall not be construed to ratify or confirm leases which, according to the laws or customs of said Seneca Nation, are invalid. And from and after the passage of this act any Indian may lease lands lying within the limits of either of said villages of which, according to the laws or customs of said nation, he is in rightful possession, or to the possession of which he is rightfully entitled, to any person or persons whatsoever, any laws of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 5. That said Seneca Nation is hereby authorized, by resolution of its councilors duly elected according to the laws and system of government of said nation, or in such other manner as said nation in council may determine, to lease lands within said villages to which, by the laws or customs of said nation, no individual Indian or Indians, or other person claiming under him or them, has or is entitled to the rightful possession.

SEC. 6. That it shall be the further duty of the said commissioners to cause all lands within such villages now leased, as hereinbefore mentioned, to be surveyed and defined as near as may be, and to cause the same to be designated upon the maps of such villages hereinbefore mentioned and provided for. All leases of lands within said villages, whether now existing or hereafter to be made under the provisions of this act, shall be recorded in the office of the clerk of said county of Cattaraugus in the same manner and with like effect as similar instruments relating to lands lying in said county outside of said reservations are recorded by the laws of said State of New York. All leases herein mentioned or provided for shall pass by assignment in writing, will, descent, or otherwise in the manner provided by the laws of said State: Provided, however, That the rights of Indians in such leases shall descend as provided by the laws of said Seneca Nation.

SEC. 7. That all moneys arising from rents under the provisions of this act, which shall belong to said Seneca Nation, shall be paid to and recoverable by the treasurer of said Seneca Nation, and expended in the same manner and for the same purposes as are other revenues or moneys belonging to said Seneca Nation.

SEC. 8. That the courts of the State of New York within and for the county of Cattaraugus having jurisdiction in real actions, and the circuit and district courts of the United States in and for the northern district of said State, shall have jurisdiction of all actions for the recovery of rents and for the recovery of possession of any real property within the limits of said villages, whether actions of debt, ejectment, or other forms of action, according to the practice in said courts; and actions of forcible entry and detainer, or of unlawful detainer arising in said villages, may be maintained in any of the courts of said county which have jurisdiction of such actions.

SEC. 9. That all laws of the State of New York now in force concerning the laying out, altering, discontinuing, and repairing highways and bridges shall be in force within said villages, and may, with the consent of said Seneca Nation in council, extend to, and be in force beyond, said villages in said reservations, or in either of them; and all municipal laws and regulations of said State may extend over and be in force within said villages: Provided, nevertheless, That nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the taxation of any Indian, or the property of any Indian, not a citizen of the United States.

The motion to suspend the rules, being seconded, was then agreed to; two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill. But I yield a moment to my colleague, Mr. SOUTHARD.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas of the $354,000,000 of national-bank circulation now authorized by law there is an excess in the Eastern States—Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut—of $70,690,046; and an excess in the Middle States—New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland—of $9,416,503; and a deficiency in the District of Columbia and the Southern and Southwestern States—Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri—of $51,088,903; and a deficiency in the Western States—Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, and Nebraska—of $21,423,811; and a deficiency in the Pacific States and the Territories of $7,625,586; and whereas after the withdrawal and redistribution of the $25,000,000 heretofore provided for by law there still will remain a large excess in the Eastern and Middle States, and the business of the South and West is prostrate for want of a sufficient circulating medium: Therefore,

Resolved, That justice demands a fair and equitable apportionment of the whole of the existing volume of national banking circulation among the several States and Territories according to their wealth, population, and business interests; and that the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to inquire into and report to this House, at as early a day as practicable, what legislation is necessary to secure an apportionment of said circulation in the manner aforesaid.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I demand the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he will not give way to let me present a bill of which notice has been given to accomplish his purpose?

Mr. SOUTHARD. I ask for a vote on my resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman who presents this asks that it be passed under a suspension of the rules. Is there objection?

The House divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 60; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. SOUTHARD and Mr. FARWELL as tellers.

Mr. KELLOGG. There are so many whereases to this resolution I wish to hear it again, so we may know exactly what it is.

The preamble and resolution were again read.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Can we not have a vote on the resolution without the premable?

The SPEAKER. The rules give the right to such a division, but that rule is proposed to be suspended with all others.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 127, noes not counted.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the preamble and resolution were adopted.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 207) for the relief of C. E. Rogers;

An act (S. No. 259) to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with Henry C. Carey;

An act (S. No. 379) for the relief of Nathan Gole, late captain Twenty-third Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps;

An act (S. No. 470) for the relief of James R. Young;

An act (S. No. 539) granting a pension to Eugene Smith; and

An act (S. No. 567) granting a pension to Mary E. Naylor, widow of Osborn Naylor, late a private in Company C, Second Kansas Volunteers.

THREE PER CENT. LOAN CERTIFICATES.

Mr. KASSON. I now offer the bill of which I gave notice some ten days ago—a bill (H. R. No. 3164) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, and to provide for a more equitable distribution of the national-bank currency—and I propose now to have the action of the House on it under a suspension of the rules.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," as provides that no circulation shall be withdrawn, under the provisions of section 6 of said act, until after the fifty-four millions granted in section 1 of said act shall have been taken up, is hereby repealed; and it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to proceed forthwith to carry into execution the provisions of section 6 of said act; and, to enable him to do so, he is hereby authorized and required, from time to time, as applications shall be duly made therefor, in execution of the said section, to make requisitions upon each of the national banks described in said section, organized in States having an excess of circulation, to withdraw and return so much of their circulation as by said act may be apportioned to be withdrawn from them, or, in lieu thereof, to deposit in the Treasury of the United States lawful money sufficient to redeem such circulation, and, upon the return of the circulation required, or the deposit of lawful money, as herein provided, a proportionate amount of the bonds held to secure the circulation of such association as shall make such return or deposit shall be surrendered to it.

SEC. 2. That upon the failure of the national banks upon which requisition for circulation shall be made, or of any of them, to return the amount required, or to deposit in the Treasury lawful money to redeem the circulation required, within thirty days, the Comptroller of the Currency shall at once sell, as provided in section 49 of the national-currency act, approved June 3, 1864, bonds held to secure the redemption of the circulation of the association or associations which shall so fail, to an amount sufficient to redeem the circulation required of such association or associations, and with the proceeds, which shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, so much of the circulation of such association or associations shall be redeemed as will equal the amount required and not returned; and if there be any excess of proceeds over the amount required for such redemption, it shall be returned to the association or associations whose bonds shall have been sold. And it shall be the duty of the Treasurer, assistant treasurers, designated depositaries, and national-bank depositaries of the United States, who shall be kept informed by the Comptroller of the Currency of such associations as shall fail to return circulation as required, to assort and return to the Treasury for redemption the notes of such associations as they shall come into their hands until the amount required shall be redeemed, and in like manner to assort and return to the Treasury, for redemption, the notes of such national banks as have failed, or gone into voluntary liquidation for the purpose of winding up their affairs; and of such as shall hereafter so fail or go into liquidation.

SEC. 3. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Currency, and he is hereby required, to issue circulating notes in the manner and proportion now provided by law, to associations organized or to be organized in those States and Territories having less than their proportion of circulation, under an apportionment made on the basis of population and of wealth, as shown by the returns of the census of 1870: Provided, That the whole amount of circulation withdrawn and redeemed from banking associations transacting business and reissued to banking associations under the provisions of this act shall not exceed $25,000,000 in addition to the notes withdrawn from banks which have failed or gone into liquidation, and that such circulation shall from time to time be withdrawn and redeemed only as applications shall be duly made to supply banks in those States having less than their apportionment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will let the bill be ordered to be printed, for he certainly cannot expect to pass such a proposition, when a large portion of it is in manuscript, under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. KASSON. The bill is printed.

Mr. HUBBELL. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman withdraws that, and I insist on my motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. KASSON. I hope we will have a test vote on this bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 73.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. KASSON were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 84, noes 76.

Mr. ATKINS demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUBBELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House take a recess to go on to-night with the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. HUBBELL. I accept that as a modification of my motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. My motion is that we take a recess to have a night session for the sole purpose of proceeding with the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would it not be in order to suspend the rules?

Mr. GARFIELD. Not if we have a night session for the sole purpose of considering the appropriation bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. But would not that motion require a two-thirds vote? In other words, must not the gentleman from Ohio move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It would take a two-thirds vote to limit it as the gentleman from Ohio proposes.

Mr. SPEER. If the House takes a recess I wish to give notice that no business shall be done without a quorum.

Mr. GARFIELD. My motion is that during the evening session no business shall be in order except the Indian appropriation bill; and, if necessary, I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Does not the condition as to the business to be considered after the recess require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. O, no. It can be made by a two-thirds vote. The question is on taking a recess and that the House shall meet in the evening for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BECK. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is that proposition made under a motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It is necessarily made under a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make a division of the two motions. I desire, first, to move that in the event of an evening session being ordered it shall be for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill in the Committee of the Whole, and after that to move to take a recess.

Mr. BECK. I wish to ask the Chair whether a motion to suspend the rules can be entertained while another motion to suspend the rules, on which the yeas and nays have been called, is pending?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] withdraws the previous motion. It was the gentleman from Ohio who moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, and he now withdraws that motion and moves that the House take a recess until half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. GARFIELD. And pending that motion I move that at the evening session, when ordered, nothing shall be in order but the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BECK. The yeas and nays were called on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The call for the yeas and nays does not make the slightest difference when the motion is withdrawn. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that it would be better to include in one motion the taking the recess and the assigning of the business for the evening session.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the business after the recess should be determined, the House may then wish to vote on something else before taking the recess.

The SPEAKER. That would bring the House to a vote on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. DAWES. Can the gentleman from Ohio not move that the rules be so suspended as that there shall be an evening session for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. And that the House take a recess immediately?

Mr. DAWES. No; let the recess be taken when the House shall so decide.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that the rules be so suspended that there shall be an evening session this evening for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill only in Committee of the Whole.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 102, noes 70.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

Mr. HUBBELL. I renew my motion that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KASSON. Were not the yeas and nays ordered on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. That motion was withdrawn.

Mr. KASSON. Then is not my motion now pending?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa did not make a motion.

Mr. KASSON. I made a motion to suspend the rules and pass the redistribution bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] and probably others, voted under a misapprehension. Had the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in regard to an evening session prevailed, the Chair would then have recognized the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] But the gentleman voted on that motion in a way to deprive the Chair of the opportunity of now recognizing him.

Mr. KASSON. Will the Chair explain to me how?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio was that there should be an evening session; not that the House should now take a recess, but that when the House did take a recess it should be till half-past seven for the purpose of considering the Indian appropriation bill. Had that motion prevailed, the Chair would then have immediately recognized the gentleman from Iowa, the House being still in session. But that motion not having prevailed, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUBBELL] insists on the motion to adjourn; and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] certainly voted against the evening session.

Mr. KASSON. If the motion to adjourn shall be defeated, will I then be recognized by the Chair?

The SPEAKER. Certainly. If the motion of the gentleman from Michigan be negatived the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Iowa on his bill.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 75, noes 80.

Mr. MAYNARD called for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 13; not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I now move that the rules be suspended and that the bill I have offered to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the 3 per cent. temporary loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, and to provide for a more equitable distribution of the national banking currency, be passed.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. On the question of suspending the rules and passing the bill the Chair will order tellers, and appoints Mr. KASSON and Mr. HUBBELL.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 94, noes 52.

Mr. KASSON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

On the motion that the House adjourn there were—ayes 69, noes 70.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WARD, of Illinois, and Mr. KASSON were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 92, noes 62.

Mr. BECK called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 105, nays 104, not voting 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Archer, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Begole, Biery, Buffinton, Bundy, Burleigh, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cessna, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Before the result of the vote was announced the following proceedings took place:

Mr. SHANKS. At the request of some gentlemen I ask unanimous consent that there may be a meeting this evening for debate only.

Mr. GARFIELD. And I ask that there be a meeting this evening for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill and that only.

Mr. SPEER. I object.

The SPEAKER. Before announcing the result of the vote the Chair will receive a few bills for reference.

J. T. MORRIS.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3259) for the relief of J. T. Morris, of Petersburgh, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. RUTH AND OTHERS.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3260) for the relief William H. Ruth, W. H. Hatton, and H. A. Bovill; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. FIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3261) to provide for a system of internal improvement by the issue of United States bonds, to provide a sinking fund for the final payment of the same, and to facilitate the resumption of specie payments; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

GRANT-PEMBERTON MONUMENT.

Mr. McKEE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3262) authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase and attach to the national cemetery of Vicksburgh the Grant-Pemberton monument at Vicksburgh, Mississippi; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ELIZA ANN M'CANN.

Mr. CROUNSE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3263) granting an additional pension to Eliza Ann McCann; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

INCREASED PENSION TO DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. MacDOUGALL, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of J. B. Murray and 209 others, asking the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1179) granting increased pensions to disabled soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures.

The petition is as follows:

We, the undersigned, earnestly ask the present Congress to pass the bill (H. R. No. 1179) for increased pensions for disabled soldiers, presented by Hon. STEWART L. WOODFORD, as follows:

A bill establishing increased rate of invalid pensions after July 1, 1874.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the 1st day of July, 1874, all those persons entitled to a less pension than herein specified, who, by reason of injury received, or disease contracted in the military or naval service of the United States or the Marine Corps, and in the line of duty, shall have lost the sight of both eyes, or shall have lost the sight of one eye, the sight of the other having been previously lost, or who shall have lost both hands, or who shall have lost both feet, or shall have been totally disabled in the same, or otherwise so disabled as to render them utterly helpless, or so nearly so as to require the regular personal aid and attendance of another person, shall be entitled to a pension of fifty dollars per month; and all persons who, under like circumstances, shall have lost one hand and one foot, or shall have been totally disabled in the same, or otherwise so disabled as to be incapacitated for the performance of any manual labor, but not so much so as to require regular personal aid and attendance, shall be entitled to a pension of thirty-five dollars per month; and all those persons who, under like circumstances, shall have lost one hand or one foot, or shall have been totally disabled in the same, or otherwise so disabled as to render their incapacity to perform manual labor equivalent to the loss of a hand or foot, shall be entitled to a pension of twenty-five dollars per month.

Mr. GARFIELD. I again ask unanimous consent that the House may meet for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill this evening.

Mr. SPEER. I object.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded; and accordingly (at half-past four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BROMBERG: The petition of Raphael Semmes, of Alabama, for removal of his political disabilities, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 5, 1874.

Prayer by the Rev. JOHN TULLOCK, D. D., Queen's Chaplain, of the University of St. Andrew's, Scotland.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

THE CUSTOMS SERVICE.

Mr. FENTON. If there is no objection I now ask, as it will not lead to debate, that the motion I gave notice of yesterday be considered at this time. I have consulted the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and it will meet with no opposition. I refer to my motion to discharge the Committee on Commerce from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 13) to regulate the service in the collection of customs at the various ports of entry in the United States and the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the laws relating to customs, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the motion made by him to discharge the Committee on Commerce from the further consideration of the bill introduced by him.

Mr. FENTON. With a view of placing the bill on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the question is on the motion to discharge the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON. Now let the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Committee on Commerce was discharged from considering the moiety bill.

Mr. FENTON. I consulted the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and it had his assent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I saw that the chairman was not in. I withdraw the motion.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BOREMAN presented a petition of citizens of Randolph County, West Virginia, praying the establishment of a mail-route from Roaring Creek post-office to Tolbert's store in said county, and the appointment of Michael King as postmaster at that place; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2782) to extend the time to pre-emptors on the public lands in the State of Minnesota to make final payment, reported it without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 443) to provide for the payment of legal services rendered by Edmund M. Randolph to the United States, to report the same with an amendment, which is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a provision to pay to the legal representatives of Mr. Randolph $12,000 in full for the services performed by him. The committee have not made a written report, and I will therefore state in a word what the substance of the case is as an oral report.

Mr. Randolph was employed some time about 1858, under the authority of the Attorney-General of the United States, to assist in the prosecution of the rights of the United States to the New Almaden quicksilver mine in California. There were two cases, that of The United States vs. Parrott and others, and of Castillero vs. The United States, the case of Castillero being a claim before the land commission, appealed into the district court, and the suit of the United States being an injunction to stay waste pending the litigation—in substance, therefore, one controversy. Mr. Stanton, afterward Attorney-General and subsequently Secretary of War, was employed by the then Attorney-General, Mr. Black, to go to California to take care of the interests of the United States there, in connection with Mr. De la Torre, the district attorney, and they were authorized to employ this gentleman to assist them in the controversy. He was employed at a certain fee named, contingent upon the approval of the Attorney-General. That was $5,000, and also such further compensation as the Attorney-General should think right under all the circumstances. The cases went on, and Mr. Randolph assisted in the trial and preparation of them in California, but not in the Supreme Court of the United States. The final result of the cases was that the United States prevailed in the controversy against Castillero and the other people who were holding under him, and that claim or patent turned out to be bad; but the triumph of the United States was a perfectly barren one, because, that claim or patent having been held bad, it brought into existence another adverse claim to the first one, which was valid; so that the United States in effect carried on this controversy for the benefit of the persons whose grantees are now the proprietors of the New Almaden mine—a very gratuitous and beneficent piece of conduct on the part of the United States. But at any rate this gentleman was employed, and earned a fair and proper compensation. As the United States received nothing for it, and as this gentleman has already received $5,000, the sum stipulated in one of the cases, the committee think it right to pay to his legal representatives the sum of $12,000 more. That is less than the estimate that gentlemen who are conversant with the subject and counsel think they would have charged in similar circumstances, but in our opinion the United States will have done more than in justice it may be asked to do by paying the $12,000 in addition, making $17,000 in the whole for the services performed. We report the bill accordingly, and recommend its passage with an amendment, having changed the title of the bill, of striking out "M," the name of the gentleman having been "Edmund Randolph" instead of "Edmund M. Randolph."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PRATT. Pursuant to a notice I gave yesterday morning I now, under instructions of the Committee on Pensions, report back to the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 2190) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty. The instruction of the committee is that I shall report this bill back without amendment and recommend its passage. I gave notice yesterday morning that I desired in making this report to submit some remarks explanatory of the bill to the Senate, and I will be thankful for its indulgence for twenty minutes or half an hour to explain the provisions of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire to speak now, or at the conclusion of the morning business?

Mr. PRATT. If there is further morning business I will yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive any further morning business.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 778) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide homes for the Pottawatomies and absent Shawnee Indians in the Indian Territory," approved May 23, 1872; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 779) to meet the requirements of the Indian service in Utah, California, Idaho, and Oregon; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 780) touching the practice in territorial courts in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and, with a letter of Roger S. Green, associate justice of the supreme court of Washington Territory, accompanying the bill, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS FROM MISSISSIPPI RIVER OVERFLOW.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to submit a report. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report it back with an amendment. I ask that the amendment be read, and I shall then ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to add as a new section—

SEC. —. That the Secretary of War is directed to issue temporarily of supplies of food and disused Army clothing for support and to prevent starvation and extreme want to any and all classes of helpless or destitute persons in the State of Mississippi who have been rendered so by reason of the recent overflow of the Mississippi River, and to make report to Congress of such issue of food and clothing and the condition and situation of such destitute people, and the sum of $60,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for such supplies of food or rations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the other bill that we passed of that character there was a limitation of time, that the authority to issue, although temporary, should expire at some definite period. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that this bill now, where we provide for issuing more property, ought to contain the same limitation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This is limited by the appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Well, I will state the general facts in regard to this matter. The whole thing is exceptional. This appropriation for this class of cases the Senate will see is exceptional in its character, and trenches very strongly upon any view anybody may have of constitutional authority to do such things; but last month, in view of what was said to be the inundation of the country on the Lower Mississippi, Congress did pass a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to do certain things. The first section of this bill, or rather the bill itself as it came from the House of Representatives, was to execute the act of the 23d of April last, to furnish the means, or, in other words, to indemnify the Secretary of War for having executed that act providing for the issue of rations and clothing.

Now it is said that the same condition of things in the nature of a public calamity has happened in the State of Mississippi, and that some twenty-five thousand persons are in actual distress, and stand in need of immediate relief. Regarding it as in the nature of a public calamity, there have been some precedents not exactly of this character but coming within this category, and the information is so indefinite in regard to the whole thing——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have you anything from the governor?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We have telegrams from the governor and dispatches from other citizens known to the Senators from that State who it is said can be relied upon, testifying to the general fact that there is that condition of things, that very large sections of the country are overflowed, and that some twenty-five thousand persons are reduced to an extremity almost of starvation. Recognizing that general fact, although it is impossible for the committee to tell how much relief may be necessary or for how long a time, the committee came to the conclusion to make this comparatively small appropriation—small certainly in comparison with what those who represent this case think may be needed—and to accompany it with a provision that the Secretary of War shall examine into the condition of these people and their situation and report to Congress, so that we shall know whether anything further is required in that direction and we shall have some better information in regard to it.

The limitation which the Senator from Vermont refers to was not overlooked by the committee; but as this was considered to be that sort of thing which would expend itself, and as there is no authority beyond the $60,000, it did not occur to us that any further limitation was necessary. Of course, however, there is no objection to it if the Senator thinks it advisable. The authority may be made to expire in sixty days. It will be entirely executed probably within thirty days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we ought to legislate on the principle of securing the Treasury in the future without regard to what we may believe to be the fact. I have such confidence in the Secretary of War that I should be willing in my own affairs to intrust him with a general discretion to expend commissary stores for the benefit of the helpless in the State of Vermont at any time which should suit his judgment; but still we could hardly legislate upon such a principle as that. Therefore I think there ought to be what was in the other bill where the authority to expend commissary stores was given, a limitation of the time within which the Department shall have such authority, so that if of this appropriation of $60,000 there should be anything left over next fall, and the Secretary of the Treasury, or of War, whoever has charge of it—the Secretary of War I believe—should think that he had found another case for the expenditure of the money, which Congress had not in its mind at all, he should not be at liberty to expend it, as doubtless he would not. But we ought to legislate on the principle of being ourselves the responsible guardians of the public property to determine in what case and for how long this species of charity shall go.

But as the Senator from Maine says there is no objection to such an amendment as I have indicated, I of course need not take time to discuss it; but I wish to say while I am up that one can hardly see bills of this kind pass without having a shrug of the shoulders, such as the Senator from Maine has, as to where we obtain the constitutional power or the constitutional right, or have the constitutional duty, to do anything of this kind. I know that to say so implies in the minds of some people that those who do say so are wanting in humanity, that they are wanting in benevolence and in sympathy with their fellow-citizens who are suffering; but I think that such things can be said without ones being justly chargeable with that criticism. If it appeared in this case that the State of Mississippi, which primarily is charged with the protection of her own poor, was herself helpless, that her treasury was exhausted, that her exchequer was in a state of pauperism, and that none of the citizens of that State were capable of being properly called upon to do this act of humanity which rests upon them, and as a legal obligation to protect the poor of that State, then there would be better ground for the passage of a bill of this character. But we did not know in the case of Louisiana, nor do we know in the case of Mississippi, that either of these States is incapable, out of its own treasury and by the taxation of its own people and its own property, of protecting these poor and helpless and outcast persons whom the waters have turned out of their homes.

I venture to say that as this case stands the bill is, in my opinion, an extremely dangerous and doubtful piece of legislation. But I do not expect to prevent its passage. I do not know under the circumstances that I should wish to do so; but I only wish to protect its duration so as to have a termination of it, when we can again consider at some time the propriety of this sort of legislation. I move therefore to add to the amendment of the committee this proviso:

Provided, That the authority hereby conferred on the Secretary of War shall expire on the 1st day of July, 1874.

I am willing to make it long enough.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. I appreciate as readily as any Senator here the motives of my distinguished friend from Vermont. He scarcely ever errs. He is now looking to the letter of the law, and the protection of the general Union. But this is an extraordinary case; there is no fiction surrounding this matter. The people in the South are starving, their stock is drowned, everything is swept from them. They are living upon rafts made of the timbers floating about their premises, and upon their house-tops, many of them twenty miles from any highway, or any rivers or lakes that can be traversed up and down, and destitute of conveyances to get to any of the roads or waters by which they could emerge from this vast region of country. Let it be understood, too, that it is the richest portion of this mighty nation. There is, perhaps, no country more productive than the region now overflowed by this unusual rise of the waters.

It is known to me, for I am familiar with that country and with these streams, that invariably for fifty years we have had a June freshet. The snows from the mountains melt and invariably the Mississippi River becomes high in June. If that state of things exists this year, as it has invariably heretofore, this water may be expected to be high and perhaps there may be greater destruction in July and August than in May and June. In that view, I would not circumscribe the Secretary of War by a limit of time, but leave that to depend upon the facts as they may present themselves.

These people are in distress. They are part and parcel of the American nation. It is a proud and a great one; and I am gratified to know that we are able to afford them that relief which they are absolutely in great want of at this time. It is, however, intimated, very kindly no doubt, that the States of Mississippi and Louisiana have not perhaps properly responded to the wants of their citizens. The States of Mississippi and Louisiana are in straitened circumstances in a pecuniary point of view, I take it. I have no hesitancy in saying that the commission merchants in the city of New Orleans have done all that they could. They, from year to year, furnish supplies to the planters in advance, anticipating their crops; but how will they render the aid asked for in this particular provided they had the ability to respond favorably? It cannot be based upon the usual expectation of being remunerated out of the growing crops, because that is an impossibility. Fences are swept away; stock are drowned; the people have nothing to subsist upon. The commission merchant must look to a proper distribution of his means, and he cannot throw them away. But I am proud to see all the cities of the North—New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Saint Louis, and others—responding most nobly to the wants of these distressed people, and I do hope that the Senate in its magnanimity upon this question, in the absence of precedents if you please, will respond to it in such way as to give them substantial aid and not restrict them to the 1st of July or any other day.

Mr. PEASE. I desire that the amendment offered by the committee be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations will be read, and also the amendment to the amendment.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, and the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PEASE. I fully appreciate the situation of this subject. I am aware, sir, that the measure before us has really no precedent in congressional legislation; but it is a case that presents itself here as a public calamity. We have one instance, however, in our recent history where the Government came to the aid of sufferers. I refer to the Chicago fire, that terrible disaster which did such havoc with that great city on the lakes, and I am informed that the Government appropriated for the relief of the sufferers of the Chicago fire something over half a million dollars.

The Senator from Vermont very properly suggests that it is a subject for the States themselves to legislate upon and provide for their own sufferers and indigent. I desire to state for the information of the Senator that we are peculiarly situated in Mississippi, and indeed in most of the Southern States. During the last eight or ten years the agricultural interests of that country have suffered from various causes. We are in that country, I may say, purely an agricultural people, and in the river bottoms, the alluvial districts, we raise the staple product of that country, cotton. During the last seven or eight years we have met with disasters in various forms; the overflow of the Mississippi and inundations from other streams; the loss of our crops from the destructive caterpillar and other causes have reduced the farming population of that region to almost a state of impoverishment. The State of Mississippi to-day is not prepared to relieve her sufferers. I am informed that owing to the money pressure of the country our merchants are unable to furnish supplies for the agricultural population. We have pursued a system in that country that I have always regarded as disastrous to the industrial interests of the people. The people have devoted themselves to the culture of cotton, to the exclusion of corn and other supplies, and a system has prevailed among the farmers of obtaining their supplies of corn and of meat from the merchants, secured by a lien upon their crops. This year the merchants are unable to furnish these supplies on such terms; and hence in that State we are in a condition of suffering. Take the counties bordering on the river now suffering from the inundation. I am informed that during the past year at least seven thousand people have migrated to that country. They are laborers who upon their arrival had nothing, but were dependent upon employment for their support, expecting that the merchants would advance them supplies and take liens upon their crops as heretofore. In the interior portions of the State, what is known as the "hill country" of Mississippi, the farmers are known as small farmers, mostly poor men who are barely able to make the year's ends meet; and again, were the governor of that State to assemble the Legislature to-day, they are unable to supply the wants of the sufferers along the Mississippi River.

I have no objection to the amendment offered by the committee. I think it is a practical one. Congress will be in session for some time, and the Secretary of War can gather the information called for and make a report to Congress, and if it is necessary, further legislation can be had to relieve the sufferers. I shall therefore support the amendment offered by the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I find on looking at the bill which passed for Louisiana the other day that the limitation was fixed at the 1st day of September, instead of July. I therefore modify my amendment to make it conform with the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be so modified.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations as amended.

Mr. ALCORN. I wish to say that I apprehend, considering the amount that is appropriated, it does not make any very great difference whether the limit is applied to the 1st of July or the 1st of September. The original bill, I believe, appropriated $90,000, and that was to be distributed upon the Lower Mississippi. I believe the Lower Mississippi is that portion of the Mississippi River known in our geography as the Mississippi from the mouth of the Ohio south. The Upper Mississippi is the Mississippi that lies north of the mouth of the Ohio. But I will not stickle upon the term that is used to describe the particular district for which this appropriation is made, $90,000 in one appropriation and $60,000 in another, making $150,000 in rations and old Army clothing.

Mr. STEVENSON. The clothing is outside of the money appropriation.

Mr. ALCORN. I was going to say that I objected to being charged with these old Army clothes. If you will bestow them as a bounty, perhaps the thanks of the people will be as valuable as the treasure that is donated. Linen dusters and Army caps and shoes are not very well adapted to people who are drowning. People who are struggling with a flood can go barefooted, provided you will feed them; but I say that $150,000 in money will not go a great way toward feeding these people. If you distribute this money, and the suffering is anything like that which is described by the newspapers, it will be exhausted at once. But what I ask is that when this money is given to be distributed by the Secretary of War he will distribute it under his immediate supervision and the supervision of his own agents, so that the people who are in distress will be the people to whom the bounty of the Government, the charity of the Government, the donation of the Government, shall directly go.

I live in the alluvial district. I have upon my plantations perhaps a thousand colored people, more or less. They may, for aught I know, become the victims of the flood, but if so I scarcely think they will starve. I propose to do what I can toward assisting them in the obtainment of food. I shall share with them while I have; we will not call on the Federal Government; and should they starve I propose to starve with them. But, sir, I trust the information which we have touching the wide-spread suffering on the Mississippi River is greatly exaggerated. I am sure that, while suffering there doubtless is in Mississippi, want which should be relieved, it is not so great as is represented; and if as great, $60,000 will prove a very inadequate relief.

I hold that it is proper for Congress to do something for these suffering people, but I wish Congress to do it in a way that will not demoralize these people.

I read this morning in the Chronicle what purports to be a dispatch from Memphis. It reads as follows:

MEMPHIS, May 4, 1874.

Captain Mark Cheek, of the steamer George W. Cheek, confirms the reports of the planters along the river above Napoleon that the negroes who have been driven from their homes by the overflow refuse all offers of employment from planters who wish to employ them, saying the Government is to furnish them rations, and they do not want to work.

No one is going to work if he has that which work will bring without any exertion on his part. In other words, if you will feed and clothe him, that does away with the necessity of labor, and I do not wish Congress to offer here an inducement which will demoralize, any further than it is already demoralized, the labor of that country. Sixty thousand dollars might go a great way toward demoralizing a community, but it would not go far in the way of relief to a community so wide-spread, so numerous, as the people of the delta.

The levees in Louisiana have generally yielded to the flood. Those of Arkansas and Mississippi have, except in one district, shared the like fortune. The appeal comes to Congress for relief. Large sums have been wrung from the tax-payers since the war for the reconstruction of the levees. Louisiana has spent perhaps $12,000,000, and Mississippi and Arkansas quite as much, sums sufficient, had the money been properly expended, to have made the levees an immunity from danger. The tax-payers, as a rule, have not controlled the appropriations that have been made, the treasure that has been spent in the reconstruction of levees. The money derived from taxation for this purpose has been expended under the direction of men who derived their authority, if not from the Government of the United States under the prestige of that Government, who came there with power to control, and who did control, the revenues derived for this purpose, misapplied the funds, and now, when the test is applied, the levees are shown, as every well-informed man knew they would prove, one extended fraud upon the people. How in the State of Mississippi? I speak what I know when I say that in the State of Mississippi not less than $8,000,000 have been expended since the war to construct levees that should not have cost in cash half that sum. To give you an idea, sir; the people there pay in the southern district of Mississippi—the counties of Bolivar, Washington, and Issaquena—one cent a pound on all the cotton they grow and they pay fifteen cents an acre upon all their land. This is a levee tax. In the district in which I live we pay sixty cents an acre upon every acre of land that we cultivate, and we pay thirty cents an acre on every acre of land that we have inclosed and do not cultivate, and ten cents an acre upon unfenced and wild lands. In addition to this we pay five cents an acre upon the whole in liquidation of an old bonded debt, one that existed at the time the war began, aggregating sixty-five cents upon every acre of land that we cultivate, thirty-five cents for every acre of land inclosed that is not cultivated, and fifteen cents upon every acre that is wild. This large sum is drawn from the pockets of the land-holders, and is appropriated by a board of commissioners who derive their authority from the popular will, and who, however honest they may be, have wasted a vast sum of the people's money, are without any sufficient responsibility to the tax-payers, and whose work, should the stream reach its maximum height, will be found, I apprehend, wholly insufficient.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to inquire of him whether those taxes are laid by State authority?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator also to state what officers expend them?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes, sir. I will state that they are levied by State authority, by officers who are appointed by the boards of supervisors of the counties; and to give you an idea of the boards of supervisors, I will state that while I suppose that in the county in which I live—a county that raises twenty-five thousand bales of cotton, where they are as honest, perhaps, as in any other county and have as much ability as they have in other counties—four of the board of supervisors, consisting of five members, are negroes, and I do not think either one of them can read or write; and the ruling spirit, the fifth man, is a white man who is less acceptable to the people than the most ignorant of the negroes that sit by him.

Mr. CONKLING. Do they appoint persons to expend the tax?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes, sir; the Legislature of the State incorporated a board of commissioners, and this board of commissioners is chosen by the boards of supervisors of the different counties, each county of the district being entitled to one member of the board of commissioners. The first, second, and third counties on the line of the Mississippi below Memphis have expended within the last four years $1,000,000; that district is not overflowed; thus far those counties have been protected; but the Mississippi River when I left home a few days since was full twenty-eight inches below the flood-line. I have no idea that the water will reach its maximum height this year. If it had reached the flood-line, or should rise to the flood-line, the whole country would be flooded, and devastation and ruin wide-spread would sweep over the land.

Now, sir, the point I am coming to is that the people in that country are remotely responsible for the government they have. I admit and recognize their remote responsibility. The immediate responsibility for the administration of those governments does not belong to the tax-payers there. They have but a feeble part at their disposal; their numbers are comparatively insignificant; they have no control. In their behalf, in behalf of the great cotton and sugar-growing districts of this nation, I have appealed to the United States Government to come to the task of protecting those fertile areas from becoming, as in the past they were, wild wastes of the great swamp region of the Mississippi River; a region that was when the war began the most wealthy and productive in all the South. Our levees having been destroyed as a result of the war, and the districts being without local governments sufficient in strength to grapple with the flood, I have been commissioned to beg the Federal Government to make the work national, to take hold of and build the levees, and to continue in the control—the State authority supplying by taxation from the land-owners a sum sufficient when applied by the central Government to maintain them as a means of protection to the country.

The tax-payers are ready to trust the work in the hands of the United States Government. If under the direction of the Secretary of War the work could be constructed, we would have a scientific qualification and an integrity which exist with the Corps of Engineers that would leave no question of economic results. Should the Government of the United States deny this appeal, then and in that event I trust the people will make up their minds, frightful though the alternative may appear, to give up the struggle which they now make in behalf of any general system, take care of themselves as well as they can, and give the rest to the unbroken and never-ceasing flood of that greatest of rivers.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understood the Senator to say that the overflow of the river is not at its highest point.

Mr. ALCORN. I said so.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does the Senator understand that to be so now?

Mr. ALCORN. I understand that to be so in the upper district of Mississippi.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to know what information the Senator has on that subject.

Mr. ALCORN. I have special information in regard to the section in which I live; and I will say to the Senate, and they will pardon me for saying it, that I know something about levees. I do not propose to state now all that I do know about levees, but I will say that I understand something about them. I was the first, I believe, in the State of Mississippi to introduce a bill in the Legislature to make the construction of levees a State measure. I subsequently had the supervision and control of the work for five years when I was paid the highest salary paid in the State, $6,000 a year, merely for a supervisory control. I speak thus that the Senate may be aware that I know something of the subject which I now discuss.

Now, sir, the proper way, the economical way, to render the relief that will be permanent would be for the Government to at once resolve to take charge of the levees, and when the flood subsides to provide labor for the people who will be left in the overflowed districts without employment. By this the country would not be demoralized, the people would not be led erroneously to suppose that the Government of the United States intended to feed and clothe them during the coming year, but they would be advised that the Government intended to supply them with labor at a fair compensation, and that their country was to be rescued from a repetition of the flood that now lays it waste. Any people upon earth will be demoralized when the idea prevails among them that they are to be fed and clothed without any exertion on their part. The great body of people in those overflowed districts are colored; they have crude ideas of the powers of Government, and should not be misled by any such action on the part of Congress. There must be an incentive to labor. Food and clothing are the great incentives to industry among the laboring people everywhere, and it is the duty of the Government when assisting the distressed who are able to perform labor to supply that labor, if within its power, in order that the incentive may be continued before them.

Let the Government, then, assume control of the levees. By this a benefit will be conferred upon those who are in distress, and the nation will in return receive a still greater benefit in having rescued from waste an empire in itself, the revenues from which will fill the depleted coffers of the Government; the maladministration of the local authorities will no longer oppress the people, their hearts will be lifted up, and they will struggle with their misfortunes with the hope and belief that their land is soon "to blossom as the rose."

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to make another inquiry?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. There being in the State of Mississippi no class of people, I believe, denied the right to vote, no man having been disfranchised at any time with respect to his right to vote, will the Senator explain to us how it happens that by the action of all the people or a majority of the people such a state of maladministration as he describes comes about, and how it happens that a majority cannot correct it?

Mr. ALCORN. That opens a very wide field. I think I could make a speech of two hours and a half on that subject, but I have no idea the Senate would desire to hear me so long.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not mean to invite the Senator, even if he would allow me to do so, to make a speech for two hours and a half, or any length of time; but listening very carefully, as I have done, to what he says, and trying to resolve the matter in my own mind, I am entirely unable to understand, stopping where he does, how it comes that in a State where every man votes, where no man is disfranchised or has been disfranchised, it can be that the tax-payers have nothing to say and that the people do not rule and are only remotely, as the Senator says, responsible for their government. I supposed there was some fact, some single matter or two which perhaps would make clear that part of the Senator's statement.

Mr. ALCORN. When the Senator states that I have said the tax-payers have nothing to say on the subject, he puts words into my mouth that I have not used, for a tax-payer is just now saying something on that subject, and the tax-payers speak very generally and very loudly on that subject. But I will state to the Senator that in the county in which I live there are about twelve or fourteen colored men to one white man; they are, it is true, a very good class of colored men, and I rise here to make no complaint against them. But those colored men are led to believe there is an antagonistic interest between them and the whites, who are generally the land-owners. They were, for example, in the last canvass told by men, whom I hold to be enemies to our prosperity, that it was the wish of President Grant, whom they justly hold in the highest admiration, that they should vote a particular ticket; that it was the purpose of the nation if they should be faithful to divide the lands among them. This sentiment was extensively inculcated by those who claimed to have authority to speak the purposes of Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the Senator any objection to stating who those men were, by name or officially?

Mr. ALCORN. No, sir; but I will not state them now. I have stated the fact upon the stump in Mississippi; I have stated it again and again, and named the parties, and if the Senator desires to look over any of my speeches on that subject, he will find that I have used plain and unmistakable language. The Senator, perhaps, has heard me in this Senate on one occasion elaborate to some extent this subject.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to assure the Senator that I have no idea to whom he alludes, and I ask wholly for information that I may understand him.

Mr. ALCORN. I do not propose to go into that now. I may at some other time, but I do not propose to be led off now into that discussion. It is not from any delicacy that I decline the discussion, but simply because I do not wish to enter upon that question just now. It is not pertinent to this case; it is not before the Senate; and I do not propose to discuss it now, but I may discuss it hereafter. I speak, sir, what I know, or what I believe is true, and I speak it here and elsewhere as the truth moves me to the action. I now come back to the floods, and to this question of appropriating money. That is the point I want to get at.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the Senator returns to that, will he indulge me one moment further?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes, sir; but I hope the time I shall consume shall be charged to the Senator from New York.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was about to call the Senator's attention to the flood.

Mr. ALCORN. I am anxious to return to that question, having been led away from the subject before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Before going to the flood——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. No. 1) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866.

Mr. ALCORN. Perhaps by to-morrow I might wish to make a speech on the subject spoken of by the Senator from New York, and detain the Senate; but if the Senate will continue this subject now I will detain it but a few moments longer.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 1 is the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask leave to withdraw the amendment which I proposed yesterday to the civil-rights bill, and to propose another in place of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts modifies his amendment.

Mr. PEASE. I trust the rule will be suspended, and action had on the bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations. It is a very important measure, and it is necessary that action should be had at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks that the pending order be laid aside informally for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations this morning. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River" is again before the Senate.

Mr. ALCORN. Now, Mr. President, I will come back to the question of the appropriation and confine myself to that. I have no doubt in the world that the newspaper articles have magnified the extent of the suffering in that country; but that there is suffering there I have as little doubt. It occurs to me, however, that the amendment ought to be so modified as to embrace Arkansas also. There is an overflowed district in Arkansas, on the border of the Mississippi River, and those people are suffering as much as others. But I will leave it to the Senator from Arkansas, to take care of his own State. In the lower district of Mississippi, that is in three counties next above Vicksburgh, there is a large district overflowed, and there may be, and I suppose is, much distress. What I wish is that the appropriation shall be so guarded as to require the expenditure to be made under the immediate supervision of the Secretary of War, and that he shall see that the suffering masses who are the objects of this legislation shall receive the benefit of it. That is what I wish. If the idea is to be promulgated that the Government intends to feed these people, that it intends to clothe and ration them for the rest of the year, the result will be that the whole country will become demoralized, and each man there who does not want to work will rush to the overflowed districts that he may be supported by the Government.

I trust that I have spoken with sufficient plainness on this subject so that every one can understand what I mean. We live under a peculiar Government. We are not complaining, and we do not propose to complain. The fact exists. We take it and go forward with it as best we can, and go forward without murmuring or complaint. I know that the State of Mississippi is able to take care of its poor, and it is able to take care of the suffering masses rendered so by reason of this flood. But the Legislature of Mississippi cannot be called together under fifteen or twenty days. The Legislature of Mississippi would then be at work some time before anything practicable could be done, and the result would be that the starving masses there, if such there be, would be beyond the reach of the charity that was sought to be extended to them. The sum proposed is a mere pittance, a mere bagatelle. What is $60,000 to a country that is covered by flood for a distance of three hundred miles and interspersed with flood for a width of thirty or forty miles on each side of the river? It amounts to nothing. It will perhaps relieve suffering for a few days. But how long, I ask, will $60,000 extend relief? Properly distributed it will perhaps do much, and I trust it will.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let me ask the Senator whether, according to his knowledge and belief, there is at the present time an overshadowing calamity on that people so that they are in absolute destitution and liable to starvation?

Mr. ALCORN. I have no doubt that they do need relief; but I have no idea that the calamity is as great in Mississippi now as it was in 1867.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Did they take care of themselves then?

Mr. ALCORN. They did; but I will say to the Senator that at that time there was a great amount of suffering. The difference between that flood and the present one is that that flood was early in the season, and the people were able to raise crops because the water went off in time for planting. The planting season is now at hand, the flood may continue; and if so the suffering must become great, if not already so. There has been no flood on the Mississippi River since the year 1867 until now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. How does this compare with that?

Mr. ALCORN. As I said a while ago, not as high by twenty inches at least. I speak of the district in which I live, one hundred miles below Memphis. From the mouth of White River south the newspapers report the water relatively higher, occasioned by the unprecedented rains that have fallen in the drainage districts of the South. The tributaries of the Yazoo, the White, and the Arkansas, have all been remarkably high, but are now reported as on the decline; they soon discharge their volume; and we may hope directly to be relieved from the effect of local rains.

I think the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is a very proper one: to confine this appropriation to the 1st of July. Should the flood not have subsided by that time, then there will be upon the country a calamity wide-spread.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator indulge me in endeavoring to obtain a little information?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. I want to know what this suffering is precisely. Does it deprive the inhabitants of food they have gathered for the present, or does it simply deprive them of the chance of raising food for next year?

Mr. ALCORN. I answer it does not deprive any persons of the food they have already provided. I scarcely suppose the provisions on hand have been lost. When a sufficient supply for the season had been provided I suppose the people could save it from the flood. It would be remarkable if the people could not lift their rations above the flood. Houses are sometimes, but not often, swept away; when the houses remain I suppose the family food could be preserved. The great distress in that country is the destruction of its stock—the mules and cattle that are necessary to produce a crop. There is where the greatest loss is; there is where the material loss lies; and a great many perhaps will not be able to raise crops by reason of the fact that they will not have the teams with which to do the plowing. A great many planters have raised corn, but depend upon their merchants for other necessary supplies. The merchants, finding their pay doubtful, refuse to extend further credit. The condition of the planter and those in his employ is in such case a hard one. The condition is distressing when the planter or laborer looks to his merchant for corn. The teams, stock of every description, where the country is flooded, must necessarily perish and has no doubt already perished. There is where the suffering is; but I do not suppose the Government proposes to replace their teams. I wish it could be done, but we could not reasonably hope for this.

Mr. HOWE. What does this bill propose to furnish?

Mr. ALCORN. It proposes to give $60,000, and that is to be distributed under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Sixty thousand dollars in all?

Mr. ALCORN. That is the amendment.

Mr. HOWE. Not to relieve men's hunger?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes; that is to relieve men's hunger; to be expended in the supply of food. And it authorizes in addition to that the issue of Army clothing to provide against cold.

Mr. HOWE. But I do not understand why there should be hunger, or is hunger there? They have just as much provisions as they had before the flood, we are told.

Mr. ALCORN. But suppose the provisions were not there when the flood began.

Mr. HOWE. Why did they not make the appropriation when they had not the provisions?

Mr. ALCORN. The Senator asks a question which I do not propose to answer just now as to why they did not do it. That was their business. The Senator must put his question to them; they are without the food—that fact is stated; the reason why we will not now debate. I would suggest this amendment; it would assume a form that looks more like charity: to strike out "$60,000" and insert "$100,000;" and strike out the words "the State of Mississippi" and insert "the suffering on the Mississippi River." The constituents of the Senator from Arkansas are suffering as much, and I think more, than the people of Mississippi. I will offer that amendment, and say now that if the money is appropriated under the direction of the Secretary of War and kept out of the hands of improper agents it will do much good. Should the bounty thus bestowed be given into the hands of dishonest men, the negro, who is the greatest sufferer, will not be much benefited, but little if any of this pittance will reach him. Let the Secretary of War take it and distribute it among the needy. In this way you will give the country some guarantee that the object of your charity has been reached.

The colored people are docile and kind; they work well, but are not well qualified to struggle with adversity; they have lived a life of slavery, have ever been dependent upon their masters in time of trouble, and there must be some spur now held to them, some inducement to labor; and this is good for them and well for the country. If one would offer to feed and clothe them at the expense of the Government, the incentive to industry would be removed; they would, as would most other people, food and raiment being assured, sit idly by and wait for the blessing to come. The Government intends no such thing as this, and I do not wish such hopes held out.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, I should like to say a few words on this subject, and only a few. It seems to me this discussion has taken a very wide range, that a great deal has been brought in that is not pertinent to this question, but, upon the contrary, calculated to embarrass it. I should like to explain to the Senate how this inundation is likely to bring upon the people of the overflowed region of the Mississippi great suffering.

The planting community in the cotton and sugar growing regions are not in the habit of laying up a yearly stock of provisions and supplies. The provisions that they rely upon now are based very much on the forthcoming crop, which is prospective. If you take away this prospective crop, you take away their ability to subsist. Planting operations are carried on by the planter who furnishes the land and the stock, and by the laborer who produces the crop. They act together. The planter, however, in most instances relies upon his commission merchant to furnish him the provision necessary to carry on the year's operations. Those are furnished from time to time and based on his prospective crop. And as no crop this year has been planted or is likely to be planted in the overflowed region, the supply of provisions to the laborer is cut off.

This suffering is only likely to be temporary. There is no necessity for any man starving in the South under ordinary circumstances. There is a field of labor there that is open to every laborer, and every man who is disposed to work can make a living there. That is my experience in the South. The danger is of temporary suffering, and the danger is also that these regions may become depopulated; that the laboring community, finding that they are constantly threatened with these inundations, will withdraw and go to the higher lands.

Mr. FLANAGAN. To Texas.

Mr. CLAYTON. To Texas, or somewhere else where they can get employment, and leave this whole region.

I am not inclined to think that the suffering is as great as is made out. I believe there has been and will be considerable suffering, but I do not believe it is near as great as we have been led to believe. I do not know what it may be in Louisiana. I know in my own State that there is a large area overflowed, but that area is not thickly settled. There will be suffering in Arkansas, and I have no doubt but what there will be in Mississippi and Louisiana, but I do not think their suffering is going to be as great as some persons perhaps induce us to believe. The appropriation reported by the committee is amply sufficient. I think, however, that the word "Mississippi" ought to be struck out of this amendment. It ought to be made to apply to the entire alluvial region subject to this inundation. I move to strike out of the amendment offered by the Committee on Appropriations the words "in the State of Mississippi."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not in order at this moment. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CLAYTON. Very well; when that amendment is voted on I will move my amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, before hearing the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. ALCORN] it seemed to me I might vote for this bill. I listened to the objection made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] with the reflection that perhaps there is no better answer to it than that it is too late. The Senator said if we knew that Mississippi was pauperized or bankrupt, the fact might add to the right or power of Congress to act as proposed. It seems to me that if we knew such a fact, the question of power under the Constitution would still remain the same. The condition of Mississippi might be persuasive; it would go to the exertion of the power, the discretion to govern its exercise, but not I think to the existence or want of power upon which such legislation must rest.

The objection may be best answered by saying that it comes too late, because in many instances such as this at first seemed to be, Congress has affirmed the power so to legislate. The case of the Greek sufferers is one, the case of the earthquake at Caracas is another, and there are others in which the law-making power affirms the right to feed the starving and clothe the naked in foreign lands. Perhaps it would be difficult to prove that we have not the power to nurture our own citizens by any means we might lawfully employ to alleviate the sufferings of residents in distant lands. If there were a distinction, however, the same power has been exercised at home. In the case of the Portland fire, besides a measure of relief touching duties on imports, $50,000 was appropriated outright, and that although the sufferers there were in a rich and populous region untouched by the calamity. In the case of the Chicago fire the Senate voted and the House voted in favor of a bill which I think was a violation of the Constitution. Nevertheless it was adopted, many Senators saying that they would prefer a direct appropriation, deeming that more clearly and surely within the constitutional power. So in the case of a famine in Ireland, although I believe only a ship to transport charitable contributions was furnished by act of Congress, still the power now invoked was asserted. So that until I heard the observations of the Senator from Mississippi it seemed to me we could stand as to power upon precedent, and, if the case for action were made out, that we could vote in favor of the bill.

My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] reminds me that no appropriation was made in the case of the great fire in Chicago and none in the case of Boston, and I believe that when such a suggestion was made in the case of Boston the people of that city declined it.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me right here, in reference to Chicago, the Government officers furnished rations, and blankets, and articles of that kind by order of the President, which act was afterward sanctioned by resolution of Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. That was during the actual occasion?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. That was during the actual occasion of disorder, conflagration, and suffering. In every such case, to summon the law-making power to action in any view to be taken of the power of Congress, we must have an overmastering necessity, something which appeals for instant relief, some such occurrence as the recent frightful famine in India which called upon the British government to make such prolific dispensation of rice and other articles of food.

At this point, however, the statement made by the Senator from Mississippi comes to give us pause. I understand that Senator to say, first, that Mississippi is able to feed and clothe and care for all the people within her borders afflicted by this calamity. He adds that the Legislature could not be suddenly convened—a fact which suggests that our action should take the form of an advance of aid to be returned—such a measure would suffice if it be true that Mississippi is able to render the aid, and that the only thing needful is to anticipate the time when her Legislature can act.

Again, the Senator says that the late flood is not equal to others in recent years; that when he left the Mississippi River a few days ago it was twenty-eight inches below the flood line; and he goes on to explain that the difficulty arises from defective levees, from an absence of those artificial banks which should restrain the river; and at that point the Senator thought me inclined to divert him from a relevant and pertinent line of argument. I thought not; and if there be no objection to the line of argument which the Senator pursued except its remoteness from the point before us, it seems to me it cannot be criticised at all. The Senator tells us that not the act of God, not some extraordinary revulsion or action of nature, but the want of levees to restrain the Mississippi River, caused this calamity; and he goes on to tell us that the people of Mississippi and Louisiana having been taxed to pay and having paid overmuch for thorough and ample levees are still without them, and he charges that the action of the General Government is the source from which this double wrong has come. He tells us that men are sent to Mississippi to take control, but as he declined to name personally or officially those to whom he referred, I was left in the dark, as I am ever in the dark when I hear like statements. I have heard them often, never to enlighten but always to puzzle me. I see them carried into newspapers with vague talk about disabilities and disfranchisement, as if the writers supposed that under the constitutional amendment known as article 14, and the reconstruction measures of Congress, men in the Southern States have, since the erection of their State governments, been denied the right to vote, or in some way crippled or curtailed of their right and prerogative of self-government, the same full right which reigns in Illinois and in Wisconsin. We hear so much loose talk that we almost forget that no disability at any time since the restoration of civil government after the war has been imposed upon any one, except a denial of the right, divine or otherwise, to hold office. When I remember that in Mississippi no man is denied the right to vote, no man, be his transgressions what they may, has ever been compelled to refrain from every right that any constituent of mine enjoys in making the laws which he is bound to obey, I cannot understand the force of the Senator's statement. Who is it that is sent to Mississippi to prevent, or hinder, or control a majority of her people, or any one of her people, in the exercise of that right and franchise which until now in all the history of the Republic has been found adequate to the maintenance of free institutions and just government? I cannot understand it. I can understand, and I cannot doubt, because it is of record, sworn to by a cloud of witnesses, that men, angered by their defeat in a cause they lost, refused themselves to take part, and did their utmost to dissuade others from taking part, in raising sound and wholesome government from the ashes of the rebellion. I understand such sinister action to have borne bad fruit in many States, and in my belief such action must play a great part in explaining the condition of things of which we hear so much. When the problem in South Carolina, in Mississippi, and in other States comes to be truly solved, I apprehend a large share of the political evils prevailing in those States will be laid at the door of men who, having the power and the privilege to shape and influence public affairs, refused to act—sulked and railed, and are now punished for ignoring the truth that—

Who would be free, himself must strike the blow.

But the Senator says the taxes raised to fence in the Mississippi River are squandered by men unfit to disburse them, and for whose selection—such was the implication—the General Government is in some way responsible. The Senator spoke of five counties, in one of which he lives. I ask the Senator whether there is in those five counties a board known as the upper levee board?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes, sir; certainly there is.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator be kind enough to tell me of how many members that board consists?

Mr. ALCORN. Five, I believe.

Mr. CONKLING. And will the Senator do me the favor to name them?

Mr. ALCORN. Name the persons?

Mr. CONKLING. The five members.

Mr. ALCORN. I am not able to name them; but I will state to the Senator that I can name the president of that board, and that is the point he is driving to, I suppose. The president is M. S. Alcorn; and I will state further to the Senator, without hesitation, that he is my son; that he was an officer in the confederate army, about eighteen years old when he went in as a private, and came out a major when he was twenty-one or twenty-two years old. That is all, if that is what the Senator wants now on that point.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Mississippi knows better what he wants himself than he knows what I want. However, I am obliged to him for as much information as he has given me, and if he will allow me I wish to put another question. I wish to know whether the president of this upper levee board appoints the board below, consisting of five in each county?

Mr. ALCORN. O, no.

Mr. CONKLING. How are the five men in each county appointed?

Mr. ALCORN. The Senator does not understand. There is one man from each county appointed.

Mr. CONKLING. By whom is he appointed?

Mr. ALCORN. By the board of supervisors; and that board of supervisors is composed of five men who I believe are called a board of police in some States, a county court in others. They have power to levy taxes for county purposes, and to attend to all county business, having jurisdiction over roads and bridges. They select one person from each of the counties composing the district.

Mr. CONKLING. And that makes the upper levee board?

Mr. ALCORN. And that makes one member of the levee board, and the five counties compose the levee board, and they elect their president.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, who are the officers in each county below this levee board? I do not refer to the supervisors, I mean the subordinate officers to the upper levee board.

Mr. ALCORN. The collecting officer of the district is a man by the name of Manning.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator does not understand me. I do not care at this moment for the names of men, but I want to find out the organization. Here is an upper levee board. Whom do they appoint?

Mr. ALCORN. They appoint their collectors.

Mr. CONKLING. In each county?

Mr. ALCORN. In each county; and they have a general treasurer, and they appoint him. These are the officers. Then the board let out contracts. They contract for the construction of levees.

Mr. CONKLING. The upper levee board?

Mr. ALCORN. The upper levee board. They give the contractors their orders on the treasurer for the money.

Mr. CONKLING. Then, if I understand, in the five counties, in one of which the Senator lives, there having been under regular State authority an upper levee board appointed consisting of one member from each county, making five in all, which board elects its president, it turns out that the Senator's son, who I infer is a native and not a carpet-bagger in Mississippi, has become the president of the board, and he and his associates appoint both the collector and the treasurer, being their subordinate officers, in each county; and the same board makes the contracts under which the levees are constructed, maintained, or repaired. May I inquire of the Senator who assesses the taxes?

Mr. ALCORN. It is done by the assessor appointed by this board. He is one of the officers that I did not mention.

Mr. CONKLING. So that the assessor derives his existence and authority from the same board.

Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Mississippi does not suppose that I put my questions for the purpose of ascertaining whose son might be a member of the board, or whether a member of the Senator's family might belong to it. He will see, I think, that my purpose was wholly different. I was unwilling to remain silent again, as I have done so often before, in the presence of these general promiscuous charges that the General Government, the national Administration, somebody, anybody except the people themselves, is responsible for all the omissions and sins which occur in many of the Southern States. And I submit that if a glaring example of the injustice and groundlessness of this talk, of which we hear so much, can be imagined, we have it now upon the statement of the Senator from Mississippi. He selected, I did not select, these five counties as an illustration. He chose them to illustrate and vindicate his statement that the taxpayers of Mississippi having but little part or control in State affairs, Mississippi is ridden over rough-shod by some external force, either as the Senator said the force of the General Government, or a force maintaining itself under the prestige of the General Government. When we come to inquire into the affairs of these five counties which the Senator has selected, when we confine the inquiries to the very branch of the public service of which the Senator spoke, it turns out that the board governing this whole matter is wholly local, is presided over by one not a stranger there but "to the manner born;" one whose capability and integrity the Senator ought to be willing to avouch, and no doubt he can avouch it truly; and in place of agents from abroad being in any way guilty of the short-comings of those charged with it, in place of carpet-baggers or non-residents having intruded themselves, it turns out that every intendment, every guarantee, every safeguard, every favorable circumstance, which enters into the genius of our system of government was present and operative, and free, and was triumphant, too, in the government and control of this very matter.

I think I might appeal to the candor of the Senator from Mississippi and safely ask him whether he thinks it is just and warrantable, speaking in the Senate where the nation may hear, that he should, upon such facts, in respect of such a matter, convey the idea that the central Government at Washington is the domineering instrumentality which has trampled down the rights and sacrificed the interests of the people of Mississippi. It seems to me the Senator might as well attribute the maladministration which he charges, to the Sultan of Turkey.

If it be true that no present need of relief exists, as I think the Senator stated, but that it is rather the future which needs to be assured, I can hardly see the urgency of taking action at all. If it be true that the State of Mississippi is able to care ultimately for all these sufferers, it seems to me, as I before suggested, that the bill should take the form of an advance to be reimbursed hereafter. If it be true that the General Government has by its action prevented the honest devotion of money to the maintenance of the banks or levees of the Mississippi, our action should take such direction as would search out and correct that evil; but as to that, candor compels me to say that I have listened in vain for the evidence or the reasons to support it.

The Senator suggests, in the same breath in which he condemns some supposed action or omission of the Government, that the United States shall take charge of the levees; he proposes that the United States shall take the supervision, disbursement, and control of the funds and the work, but that the money shall be paid by the State of Mississippi and the State of Louisiana. I submit to the honorable Senator that if such a plan were proposed and he wished an occasion to make an argument against centralization, against Federal interference, against the domineering spirit and action of the Government at Washington over local affairs, such an occasion would be easily found. But when it turns out that by no word or deed has the United States participated in this matter, but that it has been treated and kept as a local affair throughout, governed by the people in the vicinage, governed not merely by the State but by each particular locality, coming down to spots as small as counties, it seems to me that the instance is one of the most remote, one of the most unfortunate, that could well be selected for the purpose of throwing a stone at the action of the Government.

I imagine, Mr. President, it would turn out in most of these cases, if we had a witness as intelligent and as candid as the honorable Senator from Mississippi to inform us of the facts, that we should find many ways of accounting for the disorders and grievances in Southern States, without resorting to the stereotyped allegation which has been coined almost into set phrases, that the General Government by its emissaries and agents and satellites is the Pandora's box from which all these evils and distresses come. At all events, as we have had this morning one instance to which our attention has been invited, I take my seat feeling somewhat consoled that the statement made by the Senator from Mississippi has gone so far to quiet any apprehension which might otherwise be felt that here is another example of the ill deeds of the national Government.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, not being in the habit of interrupting and disturbing a Senator in the course of his remarks, I have permitted the Senator from New York to go forward without any interruption on my part at all. I trust it will not be taken, because I have not conformed to that which has become a habit and a very objectionable habit in the Senate of interrupting a Senator, that I have assented to his position.

The Senator from New York interrogated me while I was proceeding with a statement in regard to the levees, a very frank one, and giving the views that I had with regard to that which had brought about the condition of things which now exists. The fact that I was giving the reason of the calamity did not indeed lessen in any degree that calamity, nor did it release the Senator from New York from any obligation that he was under to fly to the relief of those who were in distress. But the Senator, being himself a portion of the history of this country under the reconstruction acts of Congress, has assumed some positions here that I do not think are tenable.

He asserts that so far as the people of the State of Mississippi and of the South are concerned no man in Mississippi has at any time been denied the right to vote. He asserts, after having interrogated me as to the organization of the board of commissioners, that the people through their county organizations have appointed these boards and have constructed the levees, and that the Government of the United States is in no way responsible. Does not the Senator know that in 1868 the Congress of the United States passed a law prohibiting any one from holding office in any of the Southern States unless that person could take what was known as the iron-clad oath, and does not the Senator know that the imposition of that oath excluded almost the whole intelligence of the South from the holding of office?

Mr. CONKLING. I spoke of voting.

Mr. ALCORN. And does not the Senator know that as to voting, that provision in the fourteenth amendment relative to the qualification for office was extended to the voter and that no man could vote who could not take that oath in the reconstruction?

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator permit an answer?

Mr. ALCORN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from New York does not know, on the contrary he denies, that ever since governments were set up after the rebellion in the Southern States any man was denied the right to vote. I do not speak of what happened during the interval when there was no government in those States; but, covering the whole period since the time when the present State governments in the Southern States were set up, I do deny that any man was ever denied the right to vote.

Mr. ALCORN. When was the State government set up? Now, to show the truth of my position and the error of the Senator's, let me state a case. The government of the State of Mississippi existed in 1866, 1867, 1868, and 1869. The laws of the State of Mississippi were regarded as the law of the land there. It is true that under the act of Congress a provisional governor was appointed, but the government of the State of Mississippi existed. When I became a candidate for governor in 1869, for example, I was entitled, or allowed, or permitted, if you please, to run for the office of governor, but I was not entitled to vote. While entitled under the artistic skill of the draughtsman of the reconstruction acts to become a candidate for office and accept the office in truth, yet I could not vote in the election that was held! Will the Senator deny that position, the truth of this statement?

Mr. CONKLING. I do not deny that there was an interval, a brief period of transition, which passed away at once and preceded the restoration of governments, and of that period I had not spoken at all. I was speaking of the time since there has been a government and since there have been officers to vote for under it.

Mr. ALCORN. Then from 1866 up to 1870 there was a period of time, running over four years, in which these levees were being built in the district composed of the counties of Bolivar, Washington, and Issaquena, that large district of country to-day being flooded, and from that district the officers, the commissioners that had been elected or appointed by the people, were removed by General Ames and other men put in to suit his taste. The citizen was displaced, not being permitted to hold office, and while the people were required to pay the tax, the tax was appropriated under the supervision of agents appointed by General Ames. The tax was drawn under a law that had been passed by the people of the State to construct the levees under the supposition that their own agents and employés would disburse the money thus derived from a tax on their property, but the Government of the United States stepped in and appointed its own agents and employés to expend this money. In the face of this fact will the Senator contend that the people have had the whole control of that work?

Upon another point I accept the Senator's statement that I misapprehended him, and I beg pardon for having construed him in a way that his mind was not going. The point having been made, nevertheless, I repeat it is true that my son is the president of that board, in the first levee district in Mississippi, and it is also true that he is there without my consent or approbation; he went there without my consent or approbation. But it is true likewise that that is the only district in Mississippi which is not flooded to-day. I would not be understood by this to maintain that the levees in that district are sufficient—by no means. I undertake to say, however, that before the board of commissioners were organized as at present the contracts had been made, and I might add that perhaps Major Alcorn accepted his present position on the supposition that he might be able to arrest the wrongs that were about to be perpetrated, the robberies that were about to be consummated; and I know that he does claim that he has saved from fraudulent contracts some tens of thousands of dollars to the district. But I am not here to speak of that. I will say that so far as the board is concerned its officers and agents are not in the main the choice of the tax-payers of that district.

But now let me come to the Senator from New York and tell him that perhaps he did not understand exactly the direction of my mind at the time that I stated what I did state in regard to the responsibility of this Government for the condition of things as they exist in the South. Sir, when you turned four million slaves loose and made them free, you turned them loose without clothing, without provisions, without food. You said "Go forward, freedmen, and earn your bread by the sweat of your brow." Thereupon the Congress of the United States imposed upon that colored man a tax upon his labor, upon his cotton, that extended from 1866 to 1869, whereby the poor man was made poorer, whereby the people of the cotton-growing States were driven into bankruptcy. And while this tax was being collected the people in the districts which is now flooded were being further plundered by men who were indirectly the agents of the United States Government, who held the power to not only collect but appropriate the revenues derived from the tax provided for the construction of levees. From the tax on cotton the Government of the United States obtained $70,000,000, drawn from the pockets of the people in the Southern States in violation of the Constitution of the United States, as we hold, and of every principle of right and justice. And this large sum, mark you, was wrung from the poor people of the South when they were denied representation in this body.

While this tax was upon the Southern States the people, both colored and white, were reduced to a condition of poverty from which they have not recovered, to a poverty so distressing that they were scarcely able to subsist. The planters cried out to you, "You will have to feed these colored people; we have impoverished ourselves; we have become bankrupt; our property is gone; we are no longer able to supply them with food." It was then and not till then that the Government removed the tax and said, "You may go free and enter into competition in the contest of life without any further trammels on your limbs." And now these people from whom taxes have been taken on their product amounting to $70,000,000, who were made bankrupt by reason of the law of Congress, without the power to control their government—for their government was in the hands of the Government of the United States—these people come here to-day and say, "We are poor; we have not accumulated means sufficient on account of oppressive taxation to lay up for the terrible flood that is now upon us;" and the Senator from New York says, "Why have you not done it? You have had the government in your own hands; you have had all this time to provide for the coming of the storm; why do you cry out to the Government of the United States to-day for shelter?" This is one of the hardships that I complain of as having been imposed by the Government of the United States, imposed, I repeat, when we had been denied the privilege of the ballot, when we had no voice here.

But the Senator says that I come here to recommend that the Government shall take charge of these levees; and he says if there was wanting an example for centralization this would give one. Why, Mr. President, there needs no example for centralization in this Government. Turn your eyes to the reconstruction of the Southern States; look at their condition to-day; and answer me the question as to what further evidences of the tendency to centralization you desire? I have nothing to argue against it. If we are to go forward as we are now going, if our State governments cannot be improved, then I say for one I stand ready to welcome centralization when it shall come. Better be governed by a central government than controlled by local governments representing all the evils of a central power but without its advantages. I would rather appeal to the Government of the United States and to its justice than to appeal to the mercy of its satraps. Thus it was that I said I had confidence and faith in the Corps of Engineers of the Government of the United States. I would have full faith in them, and our people would have faith in them, while they are without faith in their local governments.

But, sir, I will not elaborate and show reasons why we have not and cannot have faith in our local governments. But when the Senator from New York asks me to specify and says he has heard enough of this general insinuation and suggestion, I specify that General Ames, made by the President of the United States provisional governor of Mississippi, removed the citizens who held the office of levee commissioners in the district now being overflowed, and that he appointed men who were irresponsible, and who in my judgment plundered the district.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator think that is a fair illustration?

Mr. ALCORN. I think it is an answer to the question.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me, I will tell him why I think it is not.

Mr. ALCORN. Well.

Mr. CONKLING. The people of Mississippi have pretty thoroughly ratified, confirmed, and adopted the administration of General Ames. He is the very man whom they have selected and chosen to be their governor in the presence of all the Senator alleges. Therefore I think it will hardly do to suppose that General Ames, who is probably the satrap to whom the Senator referred, has committed acts of such aggression and injury as were offensive to the sense of justice and the interests of the people of Mississippi.

Mr. ALCORN. I admit the force of the argument of the Senator from New York in all its fullness. I know the fact that General Ames was chosen; and I will tell the Senator in qualification that I know another fact, that General Ames would not have been elected to that office if it had not been for the prestige of the Government of the United States and the influence given by this Government to his election. I know that every man who dared to speak for me in that canvass who held an office under the Federal Government was removed from his place promptly, and it was given out everywhere that the Administration was at the back of General Ames, and that it was the desire of the General Government that the colored men should support him.

Mr. CONKLING. What was the majority of General Ames?

Mr. ALCORN. General Ames's majority was about 19,200 in a republican State that was carried in 1869 by 38,000, and that General Grant carried by 30,000. But for the Government of the United States and the influence it exerted, General Ames would not be governor of the State of Mississippi to-day, a man who has no more interest in the State of Mississippi than I have in New York, except that he is the governor of the State. But I do not propose to discuss that question now. I do propose to defend those people as well as I can.

Does anybody blame the poor colored man in the State of Mississippi or in the South for what he does? I stand not here to acquit the southern people of having behaved unwisely in the reconstruction of the Southern States. I do not acquit them of the blame which attaches to them for not having won the confidence of the colored people after the war closed. I hold them inexcusable for having driven the colored people from them. It would not have been so if they had done their duty; but it was perhaps asking too much of human nature for them to do other than they did. Having been stricken down prostrate as they were, their property destroyed, all hope lost to them, it was perhaps not unnatural that when the colored man was given the right of suffrage, the southern people felt that it was an insult, an effort on the part of the Government of the United States to degrade them. Hence they resisted it; and they would have been without manliness had they not felt resentment to the Government for the imposition of what they regarded as degrading terms. Philosophy would have suggested—good judgment and cool deliberation would have suggested—to them the propriety of submitting to that which they could not avoid. Taking a somewhat different view, I did what I could and urged them to take it.

The Government of the United States was the only Government which we had. It was our duty to submit, but passion said "no." Passive resistance then was construed to mean hatred to the Government, and thus it was that the southern people were misunderstood, and in the hour of their trouble the wail that went up from the Southern States was answered back here by denunciation of the southern people that they still maintained a feeling of revenge against the Government on account of their subjugation. That was not true. You misunderstood those people. The southern people to-day have no enmity toward the colored race. It was impossible that they should have. But there have been those who have gone there as the representatives of the Government of the United States, not designedly; I acquit the President, I acquit the Government of the design; but the fact exists nevertheless that agents of the Government have been the chief sources of our trouble since the reconstruction of the rebellious States. I have not felt that the President intended to do us a wrong, nor have I felt that Congress intended to do us a wrong; but we were here for years without representation, and when the wail of the South was heard in 1867, and when thousands and tens of thousands of those people were beggars, we had no voice in Congress and no relief came. We had to take care of ourselves. We had no one to speak for us here. Misunderstood as we were, a strict surveillance has been kept up; the intermeddling agents appointed have made it their business as a rule to antagonize the races and to create distrusts which impede harmony and retard our prosperity. Exceptions to this statement, I am glad to say, exist, but the statement is in the main true.

Will the Senator from New York excuse himself for not supporting this measure? He says that I said there was no suffering. Did I say so?

Mr. CONKLING. O, no; I did not say that.

Mr. ALCORN. Then I misunderstood the Senator. I thought I certainly had not made such a statement as that. I said that there was suffering, and that it was wide-spread. I have no doubt of it. I spoke of a particular locality which I had seen represented on a map as flooded. I stated that this was an exaggeration; I felt it due to my State that she should not be misrepresented. In that particular locality we have no suffering, no beggars; nor is there likely to be any. We can take care of ourselves. I stated the further fact that the State of Mississippi was amply able to provide for all the suffering within her borders. That State is not a pauper State. God forbid! It is a State that produces the great staple of this nation to a degree that no other State in the Union produces; it produces one-fourth of the cotton that is produced in the United States. Its resources are great, but the people are nevertheless poor. I have given some of the reasons why this is so. Already heavily taxed, it will be a burden upon the people that the Legislature should be called together now to provide for this calamity, and relief would be delayed by requiring that course to be resorted to.

But I appeal now to Congress in consideration of the fact that you drew from those people within four years $70,000,000, one-fourth of which was drawn from the State of Mississippi, by the cotton tax, and that the money is now in the Treasury, that the help asked shall be given—a pittance of $60,000. Cannot Congress give this? Seventy million dollars of our money you have, and I think that the legal ability of the Senator from New York is sufficient to justify me in holding that the law under which this money was extorted was in his judgment a great hardship if not a violation of the Constitution.

Mr. CONKLING. My constituents were taxed a great deal more heavily than that, and they had representatives here.

Mr. ALCORN. Show me where ever an agricultural product of New York or of any Northern State was singled out for taxation.

Mr. CONKLING. This was not taxed as an agricultural product.

Mr. ALCORN. If not an agricultural product, what is it? It was a tax on cotton, a product of the Southern States—States that had just emerged from a terrible war, States that had been overrun by armies, that had been conquered, that had no representation in the Government. Where was the justice? Point out the power in the text of the Constitution.

The Senator asks where is the power of Congress to grant this relief. He admits Congress had the power to vote money to reimburse the Quartermaster's Department when, under the order of the President, rations and clothing were issued to Chicago when the conflagration was raging. He says that was all right. Now when the floods are flowing, when the people are being flooded, when the stream covers the houses of a suffering people, he cannot see whence the power is to be derived. Measures for relief are not to be extended—measures for oppression are imposed without regard to the Constitution.

The danger is now upon them; the distress is now upon them; will not the argument of the Senator from New York in behalf of Chicago apply with equal force to the overflowed districts in the States of Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas? I contend that it will surely.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, at the time this discussion commenced we understood that there was great suffering and destitution in the Mississippi Valley on account of the inundation; and when I consider the lapse of time from the beginning of the discussion to the present moment, I have serious apprehensions that the people have expired. Therefore I think it would be better to change this to an appropriation for funeral expenses than for subsistence. [Laughter.]

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, when this proposition was before the Committee on Appropriations, there were two aspects of it considered: one was the extreme undesirableness of the Government expending money raised by taxation on simply philanthropic suggestions, where there were not ample evidences of such suffering as made action by us a matter of the highest duty. The committee agreed with the Senator from Mississippi on my right [Mr. ALCORN] that there was great danger of demoralizing the people whom we sought to relieve, that there was great danger of leading them to improvident habits, if in the face of some slight difficulty or distress they might be encouraged to rely upon the Government of the United States in their improvidence to tide over such occasions. On the other hand, it was insisted that here was a case of enormous, far-reaching distress; that there were fifty thousand people homeless, foodless, perishing, surrounded by deep waters, taking refuge in tree-tops or the tops of the few houses which had not been swept away, and that there was such a great and pressing calamity that the Government should stretch out its hand laden with needed succor to these people thus perishing within our borders.

It has been insisted upon by the Senator from Mississippi that the first view which this committee thought was of great consequence in their deliberations, that there was great danger of demoralizing these people by extending benefactions to them, is a correct one, and he insists upon that with great force; and I admit the force of it. But he further proceeds to tell us that there is not this great distress which has been painted before the Committee on Appropriations which led to the amendment of this bill; that there may be some distress, but that it is of a transient nature; that it is not so wide-spread as we had been led to suppose, and that there is not a destruction of the present stock or the past stock or hoard of provisions which these people had laid up to answer their necessities during this season of the year.

Mr. ALCORN. O, no.

Mr. SARGENT. I understood the Senator to say that they still retained their stock of provisions; not their mules and horses, some of which may have been drowned by the flood, but that the provisions which they had laid up for their own sustenance and their families still remained and were not swept away by these waters.

Mr. ALCORN. Will the Senator allow me to explain.

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly.

Mr. ALCORN. In answer to the honorable Senator from Wisconsin I stated the fact that there was no reason why the flood should take the provisions away; but I said further, "suppose they had no provisions." I did not choose to elaborate; but the fact is that these people live by supplies that are furnished them perhaps from month to month. There are very few of them, as was said by the honorable Senator from Arkansas, who have provisions for the year. If they had provisions for the year, I admit that there would be no necessity for their having lost them. Where that occurs there is no necessity for the Government supplying provisions. And so they may have had clothing for the year. But I said the greatest distress of all would be the destruction of stock, which I apprehend to be very great.

Mr. SARGENT. It is very apparent from the tone of the Senator's remarks then and now that he does not put so high a value on these statements of distress in that region. I certainly listened to him very attentively.

Mr. ALCORN. I will say to the Senator that that is true. I saw a map in which that whole district of country in which I reside is represented as overflowed. I wish not to practice any deception here; I will not be guilty of it; I will speak the whole truth. Understand me that I speak the truth according to my judgment when I say that there are suffering and distress there; but the map that I saw, representing the country in which I live as overflowed, is not correct.

Mr. SARGENT. One of the statemen s which was made to influence us to report this amendment was that the whole country from Cape Girardeau, in Missouri, to the Gulf is one vast sea, as far as the eye can reach—that is, under water. The Senator says that that is untrue.

I have no doubt it is the same representation as that contained in the map. Now, if the distress is much less than has been stated to us, if it is simply a transient suffering, if it is simply one of those casualties which may happen to any part of the community, then we ought not to appropriate this money. We ought to feel the friction on our fingers of the dollars that come out of the Treasury, unless it be in direct pursuance of law and for a well-ascertained purpose. We ought carefully and jealously to guard the Treasury of the United States from our own emotions of sympathy, and certainly from our own carelessness. We already have given $90,000 on the spur of the moment but the other day, taking money which was intended to support the Army for that very purpose; and now comes a proposition to give half a million, and when we say we will not give half a million, then a quarter of a million, and finally the committee report back $60,000 for an object which we are now informed is greatly exaggerated in its character, that there is no necessity for so much as we supposed; and consequently the presumption is that the committee acted improvidently in reporting this amendment.

Now, sir, as one of the committee, I desire to express my own opinion; I would not have voted to report the amendment with this bill on the representations which have been made this morning. The Senator from Arkansas who sits near me states that there is no question that there is great exaggeration in the accounts which we have received upon this matter. Well, sir, how far does the exaggeration go? I desire that the committee shall have an opportunity to reinvestigate the question; that we do not appropriate these $60,000 or any other amount until we know that there is necessity for it and know that here is an exceptional case; that it is not simply the case of a slight overflow, which is liable to happen this very week, if the weather accounts we get are correct, in the Sacramento Valley. The Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers are liable to overflow and make a little inland sea there, as they do every four or five years. I do not want my people to come here and ask for this relief, and I do not want the people from any other part of the country to come here unless there is a searching, far-reaching disaster which is beyond any local help, which appeals to us with a force that cannot be resisted, for us to put our hands in the Treasury and furnish the relief.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would suggest to the Senator, if he will allow me to say a single word, that I am very free to say, after what has fallen from the Senator from Mississippi and also the Senator from Arkansas, who come from that region of country, that I do not think the committee would have reported this amendment; and under the circumstances I suggest to the gentleman from California that he move that the bill be recommitted to the committee for further consideration.

Mr. SARGENT. I accept the suggestion of the chairman of the committee, and move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, on looking around, after hearing the remarks which have been submitted and noticing the vigilance of the Senate, which is very commendable, I see that Louisiana is not represented here to-day; her able Senator, she having but one at this time, is absent. There is no voice to speak for her. Therefore, she being an immediate neighbor of mine, and this great flood that is spoken of lying across my path in returning to and coming from my home, I speak for her. I say confidently that I know as much about the overflow as either of my distinguished friends sitting immediately by me, the one from Arkansas and the other from Mississippi. I have been familiar with that country since 1822. I did not certainly see Lord Cornwallis surrender to General Washington the British army; I did not see General Washington ride across the Delaware; I did not see the great Napoleon succumb to Lord Wellington, and yet I believe the one and the other and every one of those statements; and I am equally clear that the mighty waters have flooded this country that is spoken of, just as certainly as that either one of these circumstances ever occurred. Many gentlemen here are far removed from such a stand-point, living far up the Mississippi or away up north; but when you go to the neighborhood of Red River that I am familiar with, living close by it, I know what the devastation is upon the mighty coast which a few years ago was the most beautiful coast known to the American nation, the richest in our happy land. That vast region of country is entirely overflowed, to say nothing of Mississippi and Arkansas; and this aid is needed for the Louisianians. I know that, for I am in daily correspondence with the city of New Orleans. There is no fiction about this matter.

I do not see the necessity of the Senate deferring action on the statements of my friend from Mississippi, who is happily situated, and I congratulate him for his ability——

Mr. ALCORN. Allow me a word. The Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Mississippi have not said that there was not distress in Louisiana.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I have no comment on that.

Mr. ALCORN. We have simply risen in our places for the purpose of correcting exaggerations, believing that to be due to the section in which we live. If the statements made are correct, it would take $40,000 a day for the next three months to feed the people that are in distress in that country, and I would not thank you for an appropriation of $60,000 for a moment. What is $60,000 to that whole country? It would be a mere bagatelle, as I said. It would take $40,000 a day to feed the people there if the distress was as it is represented, but the $60,000, it is held, will answer the distress that does exist, which is great in particular localities, especially in Louisiana and South Mississippi.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I admit that it is a small pittance, but that is no reason to satisfy my mind that it ought not to be voted. As I was going on to remark, there are few so happily situated as my distinguished friend from Mississippi. Gratified am I to know that he is thus conditioned. He says he has a thousand hands on his various plantations.

Mr. ALCORN. A thousand people.

Mr. FLANAGAN. A thousand people; and abundantly able is he to feed them. That is gratifying. That is not the condition, however, of those who are contemplated as beneficiaries in this relief that is sought. I wish they were all situated as he is, with the water twenty-eight inches below the flood-tide. But if the reports of the Government officers are to be relied upon, if everything that is made known to the Congress of the United States is not to be disregarded, certainly the fact is established that the water is very high on the Lower Mississippi. The Senator includes all the river downward from the mouth of the Ohio as the Lower Mississippi. That may be very well understood by him, his portion being situated about midway. The overflow is greatest from Natchez and the mouth of the Red River, in that region where are the largest cotton plantations. I read this morning that in one parish where there were two hundred and two plantations eleven thousand acres of cotton land were entirely overflowed; and so of sugar plantation after sugar plantation to the tune of thousands upon thousands of acres. I have no hesitancy in feeling confident of the existence of the distress.

I do not think this pittance ought to be required to be sent back to the committee for further investigation. If you want a special committee gotten up to look into the frauds that may be practiced in its application, have one. This is no political matter. True, it has opened a fine field for discussion here this morning, and ably have the political questions been portrayed to the Senate; but that was all out of place, as it appears to me, and yet I was gratified to hear them so well discussed pro and con. But now is the time to act. These people are suffering, and, though it be a small matter, I say contribute it to them; and if we have even acted remissly it is from the purest motives, such as should prompt American Senators on any and every occasion.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, if I said anything during the course of the few remarks that I submitted which led any Senator to believe that I regarded this appropriation as too much, I certainly did not intend to be so understood. I simply said that I believed that perhaps the newspaper accounts were exaggerated, and I do believe they are exaggerated. If all that I have read is true, this appropriation would be but a drop in the bucket. I took occasion to say that I believed there would be suffering and that there was suffering. I undertook to explain how this suffering came about. If these waters are up now, when the June rise comes on, as it generally does, there will be still higher water and the people will be unable to raise a crop this year at all. They are unable to get any credit, and the result will be that you will have great suffering hereafter. I do not think this appropriation is any too large. I was only trying to explain to the Senate how the suffering was likely to come about.

In the State of Arkansas we have a very large area overflowed. In going from Memphis westward you can travel over forty miles of overflowed region that is one vast sea of water. If that country was thickly populated, of course the suffering would be immense; but as it is very thinly populated, the suffering is not so great. But still I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that this is a great overflow, that a large number of people are surrounded by water; that they are cut off from all communication, except on flat-boats, with their neighbors even, and there will be great suffering unless some power extends a helping hand.

I hope this subject will not go back to the committee. I hope the bill will be so amended, however, so as to apply to all the overflowed region, not merely the State of Mississippi, but to the whole overflowed region. So far as Louisiana is concerned I cannot say a word, for I do not know. I cannot tell what the suffering is there. I only speak from my knowledge of Arkansas. I know that there must be considerable suffering in Arkansas from the immense region that is overflowed.

The Mississippi River is very peculiar in its inundations. One inundation overflows one portion of it and another year an inundation will overflow another portion of it. This overflow seems to be in the lower part of the river. It does not seem to extend to the upper part very much. The southern rivers that come in seem to have made the overflow in Louisiana, the lower portion of Arkansas, and Mississippi more than the upper portion of the alluvial regions. I have no doubt that while the overflow has not been as high in Mississippi as it was in 1867, yet in Louisiana it has been perhaps higher. While in the region of the Senator from Mississippi it may not have reached the extreme altitude, below that it may have reached a higher altitude; and no one can judge of the Mississippi River by taking an observation in one particular place. One inundation will overflow one region of country and the next inundation may overflow an entirely different portion.

I think, Mr. President, that this appropriation is none too much. I certainly hope it will not be referred back, because if you are going to give assistance, give it at once.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Senator from New Jersey calls for the regular order. The Chair understands, however, that the bill which has been under consideration was taken up by unanimous consent, not subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I thought the regular order was laid aside informally subject to be called up again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was not so stated by the Chair.

Mr. ALCORN. I think we might as well vote upon the bill now. I judge there is no disposition to debate it any further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMERON. I think that this bill had better be laid aside for the present. Early in the morning I made up my mind that I would move an increase of the appropriation; I thought it was too small to do any good; but after having listened to the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. ALCORN,] I came to the conclusion that it would be wrong to make any appropriation at all for this purpose. His whole speech tended to convince me that we people in the North had been doing wrong for the last ten or twelve years; that we had oppressed the South and caused all their taxes, and that actually we had made them rebel! We put taxes upon the cotton because we had done wrong here in the North! Now, I am tired of that sort of thing. I want to forget the war and all its consequences, and I think that feeling is general throughout the whole northern portion of the country; but I am surprised and mortified and pained that every day when there is an opportunity to censure us of the North somebody from the South gets up and makes an assault upon us. What wrong did we do? If the people in the South are poor, whose fault is it? If they were taxed for the support of the Government, whose fault was it? Not ours. What have they done toward paying their portion of the $4,000,000,000 of debt which they brought upon the country? Nothing at all. We relieved them of the cotton tax immediately, while we taxed ourselves freely and abundantly, and more than abundantly; but we get no credit for that.

Now, it is time that this thing should stop. If they who began the war and who separated the country into sections are tired of it, let them hold their peace. It not, if it is to continue, let us have a part in this crimination and recrimination. I have stood here for a year almost listening constantly to these complaints without saying a word in opposition; and I have been frequently told by my constituents that it ought to cease, that I ought to defend my own section. I have not done so, because I think it is better that we should forget all that has passed.

Now, as to this appropriation, I would give not only the amount in the bill, but twice or thrice that amount if it was to be received as an act of friendship, as a thing which one brother should do for another; but if it is to be received with an unwilling hand, if it is to be received with a censure and an attack upon us, I would not give them one cent. I should like to see an appropriation made by this Government which would prevent these overflows. A proper system of embankments brought forth in the wisdom of science would enable us to put such embankments there in two or three years that the Mississippi River would be as safe as the Hudson. We have been going on from year to year making temporary appropriations for that purpose, and they have only been temporary, and of course they have been wasted. The money which has been spent by the State of Mississippi the Senator says has been dishonestly expended. Perhaps it has been; but there was dishonesty in the South long before the war began. There was as much wasteful extravagance in the South in all their expenditures as there has ever been in the North, and there always will be waste and extravagance and improper expenditures of money expended by a government—not that one class of people are more dishonest than another in this country. I believe that thirty or forty million dollars would make the whole valley of the Mississippi a country as safe as the region washed by the Nile is now. If it overflowed at all it would only overflow to fertilize the country which it washed, in place of every year carrying a great deal of the wealth and the fruitfulness of the soil into the sea; but what has been done has been done in a hurry, it has been done without reflection, and possibly often without wisdom. Now, when this great misfortune has come upon the country, when this calamity is here, when people are driven into trees to protect themselves from the flood, it is time that we should go to work and get up a system which will prevent these overflows hereafter. That is what we will do if we live in peace, but we will not do it if every year we have to be denounced for a wrong which we did not commit.

I move now, Mr. President, if the motion has not been made before, that this bill be referred to a committee for investigation.

Mr. PEASE. I appeal to the Senator to withdraw that motion. I desire to say that the Committee on Appropriations had presented to them evidence to substantiate the fact that there is suffering in Mississippi and Louisiana. It needs no further investigation. It is a matter well known that there are thousands of people to-day on the verge of starvation in the Mississippi Valley in consequence of the recent inundation of that country.

I regret that when this question of humanity appeared before the Senate this morning the discussion should have taken so broad a range that the questions of the war and the policy of the Government as to reconstruction should have been dragged into it when the people of that valley to-day are starving.

I am constrained, sir, from a sense of duty, devolving upon one representing as I do in part the people who are to-day asking relief at the hands of Congress through the governor of the State, to repel the insinuation which my colleague has seen fit to drag into this discussion, namely, that if the appropriation is made as contemplated in this bill it will require a special safeguard to prevent misappropriation and fraud by the State authorities. I repel the aspersion attempted to be cast upon the present State administration with the scorn and contempt it deserves. He represents that the suffering is exaggerated. Sir, I have in my possession evidence official from the governor of the State that there are to-day twenty-five thousand sufferers; that those people will continue to suffer until they can raise a supply of food. The governor of that State a few weeks ago, since the overflow commenced, instituted an inquiry, and this inquiry has been responded to by the sheriffs of the counties in the alluvial district, and he estimates upon the reports made by these officers that there are twenty-five thousand sufferers in Mississippi.

I desire in this connection to add a further remark, that while my colleague has represented that if the appropriation is made, and the supplies distributed under the auspices of the State government, the actual sufferers would be swindled a few months since he stated, and it was known and read among all the people of that State, that he regarded the present governor, General Ames, as an honest man; and he is the man whom he has presented here to-day as being chargeable with maladministration, accountable for all the sufferings and all the difficulties that obtain in Mississippi. I repeat, it is known among the people that it was the opinion of my distinguished colleague that Governor Ames was an honest man, and the people of that State but yesterday vindicated that fact in electing him to the office of chief magistrate. The people of that State, without regard to their political faith, give him the credit to-day of being an honest and upright man. In case this appropriation be made, and the same plan obtains in Mississippi as in Louisiana, supplies of food will be sent to a committee appointed by the governor, and I believe that the governor of Mississippi will appoint a relief committee of responsible and honest men, and all supplies will be distributed to the sufferers. There will be no peculation; there will be no fraud; there will be no deception practiced in the distribution of these supplies.

Now, sir, in relation to the condition there to-day I hold in my hand a communication received by the governor of the State. He was instructed by the Secretary of War to apply to General Emory, commanding United States forces at New Orleans, for supplies to meet the immediate wants of that State, and he received a response from General Emory that the ninety thousand rations that were appropriated to Louisiana have been distributed, and that there are none to supply the wants of Mississippi. Now we come before the Senate with a simple proposition to appropriate $60,000 for the sufferers in Mississippi as a measure of temporary relief, and the amendment offered by the committee is that the Secretary of War shall investigate this matter and ascertain whether there is necessity for further legislation and further appropriation, and if the calamity is of such a magnitude as to require it, we shall have the basis for future action. The proposition before us to-day meets that case.

Senators say that they believe that the suffering is exaggerated. Sir, there are at least twenty-five thousand men to-day in Mississippi who are without food, and the prospect is that that condition of things will continue for at least two months longer.

I do not desire to prolong this debate. I appeal to the Senate to take immediate action upon this proposition presented by the Committee on Appropriations. It is a question of humanity; it is a question of philanthropy; and, as my colleague has very truly stated, the people of Mississippi are not a body of paupers. They are a proud people and a people who are given to philanthropy, as kind-hearted and charitable as any class of people in the world, and ready to respond in all cases where charity demands. But I repeat what I said before, that the people of the State as a whole are not prepared to act to-day. They cannot meet the immediate pressing wants of twenty five thousand starving people. They have come to Congress with their petitions; they have sent telegrams to their representatives, urging immediate action by the General Government for their relief.

I hope that the Senate will take immediate action. I desire in this connection, before I cease, to say that I have no objection to the proposition made by the Senator from Arkansas. I think it would be well, when the matter can be reached in proper order, that the amendment be so amended as to strike out the appropriation as applied to the State of Mississippi, and let the appropriation apply to both Mississippi and Arkansas, or to the entire overflowed district. That was really the extent of the amendment that I offered yesterday; it was to supply all the sufferers. The fact is that the supplies already furnished have been issued to the sufferers on the Lower Mississippi in Louisiana; and persons living on the Upper Mississippi have had no opportunity to avail themselves of the supplies of food and clothing which have been issued by the Secretary of War. I am perfectly willing that the amendment shall be so amended as to apply to all cases of suffering on the river. I trust that the Senate will take immediate action, and that there will be no further discussion upon this question.

Mr. ALCORN. I want to say a word. I regret that I sit so far from the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] that I could not hear all that he said; but I think from what I did hear that what he did say demands some reply from me.

That Senator declares that he is tired of hearing these complaints from the South, he is tired of hearing these complaints against the Government of the United States. What I have spoken I have spoken as a matter of history, as a matter of truth. I wish to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that, however venerable he may be in years and however much I respect him, I shall not permit him or any other Senator on this floor to suggest to me the propriety of my course. I am responsible to the people of the State of Mississippi who sent me here for what I may do in a public way. I am responsible to this Senate and to myself, and I trust I recognize that responsibility, for my good behavior and my decorous conduct here. I said nothing that was calculated, I think, to wound any Senator, to offend any Senator, to offend even the Government of the United States. I meant no such thing; but I meant to give here an indication of the truth as it existed, of the facts as they applied to the people of the State where I live, and to show that the Government could still make this appropriation without any departure from any principle of the Constitution of the United States.

I will not do myself the injustice of using language properly offensive to the Senate; but perhaps the Senator has dominated over the South, perhaps there are Senators here who have dominated over the South until they have come to believe that there is no spirit of manliness remaining among the southern people; and upon that assumption I desire to speak to the Senator and inform him that there is a spirit in the South that comes here to vindicate the truth and to establish before the world, as part of the history of this revolution and of reconstruction, that the blame for this unfortunate condition of things does not all attach to the Southern States.

Mr. CAMERON. I have nothing to say in reply to the Senator from Mississippi except as to the matter of taste between him and me. I think complaints are always unpleasant to the hearers and often to the utterers of them. I have never dominated over the South, I think. I am sure I have always had a desire to treat the South as belonging to my own country, to look upon the South as a part of the whole country, and I regret very much when I hear Senators from the South bringing up local questions so constantly; and nobody recently has been more apt to do it than the Senator from Mississippi himself, and therefore I say it is a matter of taste. If he thinks it will benefit the South, be it so.

Mr. ALCORN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes.

Mr. ALCORN. I would ask the Senator when he has heard me on such a matter on the floor before to-day; and when he heard me complain before on the part of the South during the present session of Congress?

Mr. CAMERON. I have certainly not heard the Senator during the present session of Congress, and if he supposes I said so before then I did him injustice. The Senator has not been here much this winter, and I have been away somewhat myself; and I have heard him say nothing this session about the South or the North until to-day. But from the remarks made he did change my opinion in regard to this appropriation. I have nothing more to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STOCKTON. I think this bill had better be recommitted to the committee, and perhaps it would not be unwise to give my reason for that view. When the bill was up in reference to the appropriation for the sufferers by the Chicago fire, I think there was no gentleman in the Senate who did not feel as if he would like to vote for it. I know, unless my memory deceives me, that I did not vote at all. I felt unwilling not to vote for a matter that appealed so strongly to my feelings; but yet I was not able to induce myself to believe that in the way the bill came up it was a constitutional way of appropriating public money.

This bill, as it comes before us, has not only that difficulty, which possibly may be avoided by putting it in some other shape, but it has an additional difficulty. The authorities to whom the people should look in a calamity or trouble of this kind are, first, the overseers of the poor, then from there to their township officers, from there to their county officers, and from there to their State government. That is the organization of our country. Now this proposition is to jump over everybody and come here to Congress and get an appropriation from the national Government, and to send officers of the Army, I presume, to distribute this money. Distribute it to whom? Do you want the Army to open soup-houses and take the cast-off and refuse clothes of the Army and distribute them? How? Through Army officers? It is not a decent and becoming way to do this thing, if it is to be done.

If we can constitutionally do the thing, let us do it in a proper way; let it be done through the proper officers of the State. If the proper officers of the State cannot be trusted, if the result of the reconstruction of the State of Mississippi is such—I do not know whether it is so or not—that those officers cannot be trusted, if the money will be thrown away if we intrust its distribution to them, then we ought not to appropriate anything. If it be true that those people are in such a condition that we cannot trust them or their appointed agents with the money that we may vote, in case we can constitutionally do so, to aid them in a great national calamity, we ought not to appropriate anything. If that be so, they have really no State government at all; it is no government whatever.

I do not wish to discuss the question, but I shall vote to recommit the bill, and hope that when the bill comes back to us it may be in such shape that what relief can be afforded we may be able to extend without violating those principles which most control every gentleman in the Senate, no matter how strong his feelings may be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to say one word as to the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey with regard to the method of distributing these funds. This method was previously adopted in the case of Louisiana, and I suppose in that case as in this it was adopted because it was the most efficient means of distributing rations and clothing. The Army having a very large amount of clothing on hand, old and worn out, in the sense of age, but still good, that was one of the contributions proposed to be made in that case as in this. It also includes the distribution of rations. It was thought that could be better attended to by the Army.

Now, just one word on the question of recommittal. I took occasion to say on the introduction of this bill that the committee had acted with very great hesitation and very great doubt, but from the information of a popular character which we had we were constrained to draw a presumption of the existence of the fact of distress in that country from the overflow of the river, and so made this appropriation, providing cautiously that the Government should appropriate only $60,000, accompanied with a direction to the Secretary of War to make its application himself or by his direction, and also to examine the condition of things and report to Congress for any further action which the case might require. If the aspect of the case before the committee had been such as has been put upon it, so far as my own notions are concerned, by the Senator from Mississippi and also by the Senator from Arkansas, both of whom seem to concur in the idea that it is not after all that overshadowing calamity demanding that instant relief which we were led to suppose, and which on any ground we could find precedent for, I think the committee would not have reported this bill. That is my own judgment about it. Under these circumstances I was disposed to second the intimation of my friend from California that the bill had better go back to the committee for such further consideration as would render that matter more obvious. If in fact this is not what the case of Louisiana was, a case where thousands upon thousands of people are really suffering and in destitution and want so that no power can reach them but us, I do not think we ought to pass it. The discussion to-day has thrown some doubt over it from a quarter which leads me to hesitate whether we ought not to consider further.

Mr. PEASE. I should like to ask the Senator a question. What kind of evidence does the distinguished Senator require in order to ascertain the fact as to whether there is or is not suffering in Mississippi and Louisiana to-day?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would say that we ought to have some evidence. As it stands we have nothing further than the representations of parties who give rumors. They are in the nature of dispatches, dispatches coming from the governor saying that it is represented to him—of course he is not a personal observer of it—that large numbers of people are suffering. Certain other gentlemen, unknown to us officially, and having no official relation with the State that I know of, represent the same thing. Those are little better than popular representations, rumors more or less. They are not evidence, they are not the statements of persons who have been upon the spot and seen and known the facts and who testify to what they know. But the committee were disposed to draw the inference from the general fact that we had made some appropriation for Louisiana and from the general fact that there was a flood upon that river supposed to be very high. But my honorable friend from Mississippi, [Mr. ALCORN,] conversant with the whole condition of things, says that it does not by any means reach the flood of 1867.

Mr. ALCORN. In the upper portion of the Mississippi.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is precisely what we are providing for; and so the Senator from Arkansas from the same region corroborates that general statement. That throws suspicion over the whole thing; at any rate it does not present itself here to-day as that overshadowing calamity which heretofore has appealed for the exercise of this authority. Therefore, not so much for the amount of money involved as for the precedent that we might establish, that anybody anywhere, on any occasion where there was a little suffering more or less, might call upon the Congress of the United States properly for relief, I think the matter should be further considered. Under the circumstances, if it had had this aspect, I am free to say that, so far as I am concerned, it would not have come from the committee without further investigation. I therefore suggested to the Senator from California who was on his feet that we recommit the bill. If the Senate think otherwise, very well; but I shall have discharged my duty. I have no feeling or interest on the subject. I shall be quite willing that the Senate should come to the conclusion that it is a proper thing to do on the evidence we have; but it does not strike me so. We can give attention to this matter, so as to report it to-morrow if there is any additional testimony; and if it is the great exigency that is supposed, certainly the fact can be communicated to us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 3252) to remove the political disabilities of George N. Hollins, of Maryland;

A bill (H. R. No. 3253) to remove the political disabilities of Richard T. Allison, of Maryland;

A bill (H. R. No. 3254) to relieve the persons therein named of their legal and political disabilities;

A bill (H. R. No. 3255) to establish an assay office at Helena, in the Territory of Montana;

A bill (H. R. No. 203) to create two additional land districts in the State of Kansas;

A bill (H. R. No. 3257) authorizing the Secretary of War to sell unserviceable ordnance stores, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 3258) to amend the acts of June 30, 1834, and February 13, 1862, to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indians;

A bill (H. R. No. 3080) to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, and to confirm existing leases;

A bill (H. R. No. 3162) for the relief of settlers on railroad lands; and,

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 94) directing the southern claims commission to send to Congress without delay the claims decided prior to April 1, 1874.

The message also announced that the House had passed a resolution for the printing of eight thousand copies of the addresses made in the Senate and House of Representatives upon the announcement of the death of Hon. Charles Sumner, and for the printing of the portrait of Mr. Sumner to accompany the same, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House had passed a resolution for the printing of three thousand copies, for the use of the House, of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of January 21, 1874, with accompanying reports, concerning immigration service and the better protection of immigrants to the United States, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. STOCKTON, it was Ordered, That the memorial of H. L. Gamble, widow of the late Lieutenant-Colonel John Gamble, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SUPPLEMENTARY CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 1) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Do I understand that the civil-rights bill is before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The civil-rights bill is before the Senate.

Mr. GORDON. I desire to give notice of an amendment I wish to offer at the proper time to the civil-rights bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is to strike out in lines 7, 8, and 9 of section 1 the words:

And also of common schools and public institutions of learning or benevolence supported in whole or in part by general taxation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.]

The motion was agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 30, noes 16; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and forty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and forty-eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 5, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. POLAND. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

NIGHT SESSION FOR INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] to yield while I ask unanimous consent for an evening session to-night at half past seven o'clock for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SPEER. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] will indicate when he will allow the House to go on with their appropriation bills——

Mr. SPEER. I am willing the House shall go on at any time when there is a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. There must be a quorum present to transact business.

Mr. SPEER. There is not a quorum present at evening sessions.

The SPEAKER. There can be no business done.

Mr. SPEER. I have no objection to an evening session if the gentleman will agree that there shall be a quorum present, or that there shall be no business done without a quorum.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman can insist upon a quorum being present if he wish.

Mr. SPEER. I withdraw my objection with the understanding that there shall be a quorum present.

No further objection being made, it was so ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the order just made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STEAMBOAT PASSENGER BILL.

Mr. NEGLEY. I ask unanimous consent that Saturday next be set apart for the consideration of the bill for the better protection of the lives of passengers on board steamboats.

Mr. RANDALL. Does it embrace anything in relation to pilotage on rivers running between States?

Mr. NEGLEY. Nothing of the sort.

Mr. POTTER. I object.

DISTRICT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. FOSTER submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on the Affairs of the District be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire whether the officers or employés of the United States or any officers or employés of the District government have been engaged in any conspiracy to defeat or hinder the investigation ordered by Congress into the affairs of the District, and particularly in this connection to inquire into all the circumstances connected with the late robbery of the safe in the office of the United States attorney for the District of Columbia.

SETTLERS ON RAILROAD LANDS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Public Lands, for consideration at this time, the bill (H. R. No. 3162) for the relief of settlers on railroad lands, with an amendment.

The bill, as amended, was then read. It provides that in the adjustment of all railroad grants, whether made directly to any railroad in or to any State for railroad purposes, if any of the lands granted be found in the possession of an actual settler whose entry or filing has been allowed under the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States subsequent to the time at which, by the decision of the land office, the right of said road was declared to have attached to such lands, the grantees, upon a proper relinquishment of the lands so entered or filed for, shall be entitled to select an equal quantity of other lands in lieu thereof from any of the public lands within the limits of the grant not otherwise appropriated at the date of selection, to which they shall receive title the same as though originally granted. And any such entries or filings thus relieved from conflict may be perfected into complete title as if such lands had not been granted; provided that nothing therein contained shall in any manner be so construed as to enlarge the grant to any such railroad. And it is further provided that the act shall not be construed so as in any manner to confirm or legalize any decision or ruling of the Interior Department under which lands have been certified to any railroad company when such lands have been entered by a pre-emption or homestead settler after the location of the line of the road and prior to the notice to the local land office of the withdrawal of such lands from market.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to make a single remark in explanation of the bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I object to the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I hope the gentleman will hear an explanation.

Mr. DUNNELL. This bill is entirely in the interest of settlers whose filings are now ready for cancellation. There are from fifty to two hundred such cases in every congressional district of the West in which there are land grants in process of adjustment, where the filings are ready for cancellation. This bill simply provides that the railroads which are entitled to those lands shall accept other lands and allow the settlers to remain on the lands where they have made improvements. A more important and beneficent measure has not been presented to this Congress. It was introduced by my colleague from the second district, [Mr. STRAIT,] and has been before our Committee on Public Lands where it received the hearty and unanimous indorsement of the committee. If the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] could see the beneficence of this bill as we from the frontiers do, that it was entirely in the interest of the settlers, I know he would withdraw his objection. And I appeal to him to do so, and trust he will do so.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I withdraw my objection to this bill; but after this I shall call for the regular order.

There being no further objection, the amendment reported by the committee was agreed to, the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I call for the regular order.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS IN UTAH.

Mr. POLAND. By direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, authorized to report on this subject at any time, I report back the bill (H. R. No. 3097) in relation to courts and judicial officers in the Territory of Utah.

RIGHTS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS.

Mr. MYERS. Before the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] proceeds with this bill, I desire to make a remark or two in reference to the order of business. When the committee were on call last Friday, the bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, entitled a bill (H. R. No. 2199) to carry into execution the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution concerning citizenship and to define certain rights of citizens of the United States in foreign countries and certain duties of diplomatic and consular officers, and for other purposes, was understood to go over until to-day. I desired to submit some remarks in relation to that bill. I was notified for the first time by reading the RECORD that the bill had been withdrawn by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.] I have no objection to that. On the contrary, I desired that it should be withdrawn; but I supposed it would come up this morning, and that remarks might be submitted upon it. I would like to know whether the bill is in order this morning, and if not——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] who had charge of the bill, withdrew it by unanimous consent of the House. It required unanimous consent to allow the motion to reconsider to be withdrawn.

Mr. MYERS. Although a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I knew nothing of the withdrawal until I saw it stated in the RECORD. Under the circumstances I ask to submit some remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the bill in relation to citizenship is to be withdrawn for further examination and amendment; but inasmuch as it has been publicly debated, I feel it a duty, before its recommittal, to point out one of its features which grows more objectionable to me the more I examine it.

I allude to the clause which deprives American citizens from being subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, within the intent of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, when they have resided abroad within the dominions of a foreign state for the period of two years, unless upon registering themselves as citizens of the United States in the manner designated—such residence of itself to constitute a "domicile," or fixed habitation, with intent to remain indefinitely.

To state the case in its strongest light, no alien, except one honorably discharged from the service of the United States, can under any circumstances be endowed with American citizenship until after a residence here of five years; but if this bill should become a law, a native-born American may lose this inestimable right by a residence abroad of two years, without any action or desire on his part to expatriate himself.

No question ever came more legitimately before a committee than this one in regard to domicile and citizenship, and it is only fair to say that I believe no bill was ever reported in better faith to the country and with a greater desire to protect its citizens than the one which has been so ably advocated by my colleagues, the distinguished gentlemen from Massachusetts and Indiana, [Mr. E. R. HOAR and Mr. ORTH.]

The act of July 27, 1868, having unequivocally declared the right of expatriation, the President in August last propounded to the several members of his Cabinet a number of questions as to what would in their opinion amount to an act of expatriation by an American citizen; what residency abroad, without an apparent intent to return, should constitute domicile, and deprive the American citizen of his right to claim the protection of our Government, and particularly what should be deemed evidence of the absence of an intent to return in such cases, together with other questions in regard to the citizenship of children born abroad under such circumstances, and the right to resume citizenship on a return to the country. The very able replies of the Cabinet, with the documents appended, in all covering over two hundred and fifty pages, form the most valuable collection upon expatriation, naturalization, domicile, and citizenship which we have. The whole subject, with that part of the President's message in regard to it, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the result is the bill before the House. I say, therefore, that no question ever came more legitimately before a committee, and none better deserves to occupy attention, challenging nevertheless, as it should, the closest scrutiny.

I am not aware, however, that any cases have arisen which, by threatening to bring the country into difficulty, call for speedy legislation on this important subject. It cannot have a too careful consideration, and it is well that it should be recommitted.

This right of expatriation, Mr. Speaker, is no new doctrine with us. From the very foundation of our Government we have asserted it. We went to war with England in 1812 for its vindication, and although that war ended in both parties adhering to their views, the United States never wavered a moment from its maintenance. Finally, on July 27, 1868, this American doctrine was crystallized into a law, which enacts:

> That any declaration, instruction or opinion, order or decision, of any officers of this Government which denies, restricts, impairs, or questions the right of expatriation is hereby declared inconsistent with the fundamental principles of this Government.

And—

> That all naturalized citizens of the United States, while in foreign states, shall be entitled to and shall receive from this Government the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situations and circumstances.

I always felt proud that I was in the Congress which passed that law and upon the committee which reported it. It won from England the Clarendon-Motley treaty of 1870, by which Great Britain at last acknowledged that American naturalization deprived her sons of English nationality. The North German Union, Bavaria, Baden, Hesse, and Würtemberg had already in 1868, while the subject was being debated here, made similar admissions by treaty with us, followed after the date of this law by Belgium, Sweden, and Norway, and Austria. It dealt a fatal blow to the feudal relic known as perpetual or inalienable allegiance, and gave notice to the world that the person who bore the right to say "I am an American citizen," native or naturalized, should receive the protection of the Government.

But, Mr. Speaker, all through the history of this doctrine, which now is embodied into law, the right of expatriation meant the right of voluntary expatriation—the voluntary abnegation of nationality. The bill reported, however, is a new departure. It prescribes a time in which the citizen, resident abroad, is adjudged to have expatriated himself without any avowal on his part, or any act other than such residence. It declares for him an intent to forsake his country, whether such intent exists or not.

By its terms two years' continuous residence in the dominions of a foreign power shall, unless he chooses to register, denationalize an American citizen, whether naturalized or born upon the soil. He may love the flag, glory in our institutions, defend them whenever attacked. He may be known as an American, may register his name on all proper occasions as such, may have remained abroad for his education or his health, or upon business or pleasure, but without the registry at one of our consulates his rights as a citizen are to be taken away, and not only his rights, but it may be those of his children born abroad after such citizenship is gone, or of his widow.

I understood my colleague [Mr. HOAR] to say that this creation of a domicile which will end upon the party returning to the United States will not deprive him of his citizenship; but that cannot be. He loses it while he remains absent after such domicile, and all the benefits consequent upon it during that time. The very title of the bill relates to citizenship. The fourteenth amendment defines citizenship, and this bill takes from Americans domiciled abroad the vital element named in that amendment by declaring that—

> They shall be regarded as not subject to the jurisdiction of the United States within the intent of the said fourteenth amendment, or as not residing within the United States within such intent.

The Secretary of State well said, in his reply to the President:

> The fourteenth amendment of the Constitution makes personal subjection to the jurisdiction of the United States an element of citizenship.

How, then, can citizenship remain when this subjection is gone?

Jurisdiction is but another word for sovereignty. Where it exists the flag floats as a protection, whether within the territorial limits of a country or on the decks of its vessels, whether beneath its consulates or in its service anywhere, and that sovereignty follows the citizen in every land and upon every sea, while he does no act to disavow it, so far as to give him protection from wrong, amenable though he be temporarily to the local laws of his residence which also afford him protection. It was this jurisdiction which caused the interference of the House of Representatives in Dr. Houard's case, a native-born American, still true to his allegiance, who had resided more than twenty years in Cuba. It was this jurisdiction which proved so strong a bulwark to our citizens in Paris during the Franco-Prussian war. It was this jurisdiction which, when the Virginius was captured on the high seas with the American flag floating at her mast-head, roused the indignation of our people and caused the Government to spend millions of dollars in order to save the survivors of the massacre. It is this jurisdiction without which citizenship does not exist, and which in the cases I have referred to it is proposed to withdraw.

As I have shown, the subject only came before us upon the question of expatriation. It was asked whether the Government "should extend its protection" to such persons as leave its territories and who reside abroad without an apparent intent to return to them, and who do not contribute to its support, and what should constitute evidence of this absence of intent. The bill declares that two years' residence abroad under one sovereignty shall constitute a "domicile," and of itself imply a fixed residence with intent to remain indefinitely. That means expatriation and a renunciation of allegiance, for the time at least. The object of the bill is to take protection away in such cases. Surely citizenship must have ceased before that great privilege can be yielded. Protection is the first and grandest right due by the state to the citizen, not less sacred to-day than when Paul of Tarsus—whose citizens were naturalized as Roman by Cæsar—was released from his bonds the moment he said unto the centurion, "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman, and uncondemned?"

I repeat it, this is a new departure; for hitherto domicile, which is described by Vattel as "the habitation fixed in any place with an intention of always staying there," has only been acquired and the intent could only be shown by the avowal or acts of the party.

I am not prepared to say that any limit of residence should ever be made a test to determine this intent in the absence of avowal or acts; but if so, then before fixing it remember that protection is not the only right we are asked to take away. Once strike citizenship from a man and his rights of succession and inheritance are subject to the laws of his domicile. The Turkish law allowed no will to be made by a Turkish subject, but divided his property between his relations in certain fixed proportions, and a question arising upon a will made in Smyrna, it was held to be valid because made by a British subject, but that if deceased had been domiciled in Turkey he could have made no will. (Phillimore on Domicile, page 151.) This merely serves as an illustration.

Section 4 of the bill preserves "the right of inheritance or succession to real or personal property in any State;" but that cannot control the direction of personal property abroad, which follows the domicile, and, as I have shown, this may apply to realty also. Suppose an American residing in a foreign land, either from ill health or other cause, fails to register within the six months after the foreign domicile is acquired, his children born subsequent to this domicile are not during their minority to be citizens of the United States, and their persons and property abroad not to be protected because the father was not a citizen of the United States residing in and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States at the time of their birth.

Is it not best to look these consequences in the face in fixing any limit to that citizenship which either as birthright or boon is held so precious by every people?

The gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] praised never too warmly the zealous protection which England never yet failed to demand for her citizens. No blood of hers was ever too dear to be shed for the humblest of them. Right proudly has our own country vindicated its honor wherever the liberties of those entitled to its protection were in danger, and I speak for all my colleagues of the committee when I say that no bill will emanate from it which trenches a hair's breadth upon the privileges of any American citizen. The object of the bill was to render them still dearer, but where the question of renunciation of allegiance is one of intent, it is a very delicate one to prescribe by law. The commission appointed by Queen Victoria in 1868, of which Lord Tenterden was secretary, reported upon this identical subject as follows:

> We have considered the question whether the acquisition of a foreign domicile, or a certain length of residence abroad, should divest a person of British nationality. We have not been able to satisfy ourselves that either continued residence or domicile could be practically adopted as a rule to determine the allegiance of the subject, having regard to the difficulties which attend the definition of domicile, and proof of the fact, and also to the great diversity of circumstances under which men reside in foreign countries.

Indeed, it is well established that as on the one hand expatriation may be at once consummated by the acts and avowal of the party, on the other hand no length of absence will necessarily give the right to infer it in the absence of such acts or avowal. Secretary Fish properly states the law to be that "the citizen may reside abroad for an indefinite period; he may acquire a commercial or a civil domicile there; but if he do so, sincerely and bona fide, animo revertendi, and do nothing inconsistent with his pre-existing allegiance, he will not thereby have taken any step toward self-expatriation."

In the case of the Charming Betsey (2 Cranch, 120) Chief Justice Marshall said:

> The American citizen who goes into a foreign country, although he owes local and temporary allegiance to that country, is yet, if he performs no other act changing his condition, entitled to the protection of our Government.

If, then, a new principle is to be established; if a definition of intent to renounce allegiance is to be fixed by metes and bounds of time, certainly two years' residence abroad in one country is too short a time to justify such a presumption. As I have said, our naturalization laws require a residence of five years in the United States, except in the single instance of service in the Army or Navy, before any foreigner, no matter how desirous of it he may be, can be invested with our citizenship. Why, if at all, should we cast off this adopted citizen? Above all, why should we disclaim the native-born—both being guaranteed protection alike—in less time than we prescribe for a foreigner to put on the robes of our citizenship? No matter how many years an alien may have resided in the United States he shall, two years before becoming entitled to citizenship, declare his intention to "renounce forever all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whatever, and particularly, by name, the prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty whereof such alien may, at the time, be a citizen or subject;" and he is by the law denominated an "alien" until his final naturalization. So that we recognize for aliens a citizenship of birth or adoption under circumstances where it is proposed to deny it to Americans. The intimation seems to be that this term of two years is named because several of our treaties with foreign powers have designated it. This is a mistake. By most of these treaties citizens of one nationality are deemed and taken to have become citizens of the other by a continuous residence of five years in the territories of the other and by naturalization, and are to be treated as such. Naturalization alone is required in several. It is true that by the treaties with Bavaria, Denmark, Hesse, Mexico, the North German Union, Sweden and Norway, and Würtemberg the intent not to return may be held to exist when the person naturalized in the one country resides more that two years in the land of his nativity, but no limit is placed on a native-born and none on a naturalized citizen when abroad except upon a renewed residence in the land of his birth. It will be noticed that England in her treaty with us claimed no such resumption of British nationality, and only stipulated for it with us, where the native-born of either country after naturalization in the other should publicly renounce such naturalization, and elect to resume his original nationality within two years from the conclusion of the treaty.

In La Virginie (5 Robinson) Sir William Scott declared, what has ever since been recognized as law, that—

> It is also to be remembered that the native character easily reverts, and that it requires fewer circumstances to constitute a domicile in the case of the native subject than to impress a national character on one who is originally of another country.

This doctrine, no doubt, caused the exception in the treaties alluded to. They are now binding, and I do not propose to discuss them. In these cases, and these alone, it will be impossible to give that equal protection to native and naturalized which the act of 1868 calls for. It is not likely to produce any hardship; but I earnestly protest against the establishment of a general law to conform to this exception. Prussia, I believe, is the only country which denationalizes its citizens for absence from her dominions, and by her laws it takes ten years of such absence to deprive them of their citizenship.

The case of Martin Koszta, a Hungarian by birth, is often quoted as one where we afforded protection in another country to one who was not our citizen, claiming that he had absolved himself of his native allegiance. Koszta, however, had declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States. Even this would not have justified our interference in his behalf had he returned to Austrian territory. He was kidnaped from Turkish soil, whither he had gone in an American vessel and while under the protection of the American consulate. Commander Ingraham demanded and obtained his surrender from the Austrian vessel which was about to carry him away. Secretary Marcy approved and the whole nation applauded the act, because Koszta had acquired a domicile here entitling him to the protection of our flag unless upon a return to the domicile of his nativity. But in the case of Simon Tousig, which arose shortly afterward, Mr. Marcy refused to interfere, holding that, not being a citizen of the United States, his passport was improperly granted and did not protect him upon his voluntary return to Austria, of which country he was a subject. The case of Koszta, there is little doubt, caused the insertion of a stipulation in most of our treaties made since with the powers of continental Europe, that "the declaration of an intention to become a citizen of the one or the other country has not for either party the effect of naturalization."

The right of expatriation we have so successfully asserted is the right of voluntary expatriation, a question of intent in each case, very difficult to measure by a general law. It may be well, in the interest of Americans resident for any cause in a foreign land, as well as in the interest of the Government, to prescribe that an annual or biennial registry at one of our consulates shall act as a continued assertion of their allegiance, but I fear it would work great injustice to make the absence of such registry an act of expatriation or renunciation of allegiance until their return. Certainly it would if the little lapse of time named in the bill could cause such a result.

Love of country is nearest to the heart; citizenship in all lands is held sacred. In America it is a pearl without price, which untold thousands are seeking and few are found willing to renounce.

Let us carefully reconsider the delicate question involved in this discussion, lest by any act of ours we impair the value of American citizenship.

[Mr. CONGER obtained leave to print remarks on the bill relative to rights of citizens.] (See Appendix.)

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] promised me a few minutes to speak on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, who had charge of the bill, withdrew the motion to reconsider on Saturday by unanimous consent.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Is it probable that the bill will ever come up again for discussion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised on that point. The gentleman from Massachusetts can perhaps answer.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I would like to know what was the object of the gentleman in withdrawing the bill and having it referred again to the committee.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The principal reason for the withdrawal of the bill was that whereas the committee proposed quite a number of amendments which were printed with the bill, the House seemed to be discussing various propositions that could not arise.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. The gentleman from Massachusetts handed me a few days ago a copy of the amendments agreed to by the committee, and I proposed to discuss those when I came to speak upon the bill. I understood the gentleman to say that there were but three persons who desired to speak on the question, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MYERS,] myself, and another gentleman whose name I have forgotten.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The number was increasing. At any rate, the present position of the bill is that it has gone back to the committee.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Will it be reported again?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I have no knowledge on that point; that will be for the committee to determine. I am very sorry if the gentleman has lost the opportunity to deliver his speech. I would move that he be allowed to print his remarks.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I do not want that privilege; but I did want to say a few words on the bill. Is there no chance, Mr. Speaker, for me to get off my speech?

The SPEAKER. There may be hereafter, but the Chair can give the gentleman no assurance on that point.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS IN UTAH.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3097) reported by Mr. POLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, entitled "A bill in relation to courts and judicial officers in the Territory of Utah."

Mr. CROUNSE. Is this bill presented for action at the present time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised.

Mr. POLAND. It is reported for action.

The SPEAKER. The House gave the Judiciary Committee authority to report on this subject at any time.

Mr. CROUNSE. I understand, then, that it is the purpose of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] to press the bill for action at this time. If so, I wish to raise a point of order upon it which may obviate the necessity of reading the bill at length. The bill provides for the creation of new offices and for the appropriation of money, which fact I understand would necessarily require the bill to go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It is the impression of the Chair that the committee had the right to report the bill for consideration in the House.

Mr. CROUNSE. I do not so understand; I would like to have the record on that point referred to.

Mr. POLAND. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in his assumption of facts.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. CROUNSE. One word before the bill is read.

The SPEAKER. It must be read in any event before the Chair can rule.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of the United States marshal of the Territory of Utah, in person or by deputy, to attend all sessions of the supreme and district courts in said Territory, and to serve and execute all process and writs issued out of, and all orders, judgments, and decrees made by, said courts, or by any judge thereof, unless said court or judge shall otherwise order in any particular case. All process, writs, or other papers left with said marshal, or either of his deputies, shall be served without delay, and in the order in which they are received, upon payment or tender of his legal fees therefor; and it shall be unlawful for said marshal to demand or receive mileage for any greater distance than the actual distance by the usual routes from the county seat of the county in which the service is to be made or process executed to the place of service or execution of process, writ, or other paper; except that when it shall be necessary to convey any person arrested by legal authority out of the county in which he is arrested, said marshal shall be entitled to mileage for the whole distance necessarily traveled in delivering the person so arrested before the court or officer ordering such arrest. Said marshal is hereby authorized to appoint as many deputies as may be necessary, each of whom shall have authority, in the name of said marshal, to perform any act with like effect and in like manner as said marshal. Such appointment shall not be complete until he shall give bond to said marshal, with sureties to be by him approved, in the penal sum of $10,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties; and he shall also take and subscribe the same oath prescribed by law to be taken by said marshal; and said appointment, bond, and oath shall be filed and remain in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of said Territory. In actions brought against said marshal for the misfeasance or non-feasance of any deputy, it shall be lawful for the plaintiff, at his option, to join the said deputy and the sureties on his bond with said marshal and his sureties.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the United States attorney in said Territory, in person or by an assistant, to attend all the courts of record having jurisdiction of offenses as well under the laws of said Territory as of the United States, and perform the duties of prosecuting officer in all criminal cases arising in said courts; and he is hereby authorized to appoint as many assistants as may be necessary, each of whom shall subscribe the same oath as is prescribed by law for said United States attorney; and the said appointment and oath shall be filed and remain in the office of the clerk of the supreme court of said Territory. The United States attorney shall be entitled to the same fees for services rendered by said assistants as he would be entitled to for the same services if rendered by himself.

SEC. 3. That there shall be held in each year two terms of the supreme court of said Territory, and four terms of each district court at such times as the governor of the Territory may by proclamation fix. The district courts shall have exclusive original jurisdiction in all suits or proceedings in chancery, and in all actions at law in which the sum or value of the thing in controversy shall be $300 or upward, and in all controversies where the title, possession, or boundaries of land, or mines or mining claims shall be in dispute, whatever their value, except in actions for forcible entry or forcible or unlawful detainer; and they shall have jurisdiction in suits for divorce. When a bill is filed by a woman to declare a marriage or pretended marriage void, on account of a previous subsisting marriage of the defendant to another woman, the court or judge thereof may grant such reasonable sum for alimony and counsel fees as the circumstances of the case will justify, and may likewise, by final decree, make such allowance for the maintenance of the complainant and her children by the defendant as may be just and reasonable. And whenever, in any proceeding for divorce, or in any civil cause, or in any criminal prosecution, it is necessary to prove the existence of the marriage relation between two persons, it shall not be necessary to prove the same by the production of any record or certificate of the marriage, but evidence of cohabitation between the parties as husband and wife, and the acts, conduct, declarations, and admissions of the parties shall be admissible, and the marriage may be established like any question of fact. Probate courts, in their respective counties, shall have jurisdiction in the settlement of the estates of decedents, and in matters of guardianship and other like matters; but otherwise they shall have no civil, chancery, or criminal jurisdiction whatever; they shall have jurisdiction of suits of divorce for statutory causes concurrently with the district courts; but any defendant in a suit for divorce commenced in a probate court shall be entitled, after appearance and before plea or answer, to have said suit removed to the district court having jurisdiction, when said suit shall proceed in like manner as if originally commenced in said district court. All judgments and decrees heretofore rendered by the probate courts which have been executed, and the time to appeal from which has by the existing laws of said Territory expired, are hereby validated and confirmed. The jurisdiction heretofore conferred upon justices of the peace by the organic act of said Territory is extended to all cases where the debt or sum claimed shall be less than $300. From all final judgments of justices of the peace an appeal shall be allowed to the district courts of their respective districts, in the same manner as is now provided by the laws of said Territory for appeals to the probate courts; and from the judgments of the probate courts an appeal shall lie to the district court of the district embracing the county in which such probate court is held in such cases and in such manner as the supreme court of said Territory may, by general rules framed for that purpose, specify and designate, and such appeal shall vacate the judgment appealed from, and the case shall be tried de novo in the appellate court. Appeals may be taken from both justices' and probate courts to the district court of their respective districts in cases where judgments have been heretofore rendered and remain unexecuted; but this provision shall not enlarge the time for taking an appeal beyond the periods now allowed by the existing laws of said Territory for taking appeals. Whenever the condition of the business in the district court of any district is such that the judge of the district is unable to do the same, he may request the judge of either of the other districts to assist him, and, upon such request made, the judge so requested may hold the whole or part of any term, or any branch thereof, and his acts as such judge shall be of equal force as if he were duly assigned to hold the courts in such district.

SEC. 4. That within sixty days after the passage of this act, and annually thereafter, the governor of the Territory shall appoint in each county two male citizens of the United States, who shall have resided in such county for one year next preceding, who, with the sheriff of such county, shall constitute a board of jury commissioners for such county, and the commissioners appointed by the governor shall hold their offices for one year and until others shall be appointed in their stead. The governor shall by proclamation fix a time and place for the meeting of such commissioners in each county, and at the time and place so fixed each of such boards shall proceed to make a list, which shall contain the names and residences of all the male citizens of the United States who have resided within such county for six months next preceding, who are above twenty-one years of age and who can read and write in the English language; and when said list is completed, it shall be duly certified by such commissioners and returned to the clerk of the district court of the district in which such county is situated; and the lists thus furnished shall constitute a jury-list, from which shall be drawn all grand and petit jurors to serve in the district courts for the year next following. And the said commissioners shall be paid five dollars a day for each day's service as such commissioners and ten cents a mile for necessary travel, and their accounts shall be audited by the governor, and the governor shall draw orders on the treasurer of the Territory for the amount, which shall be paid by him out of any money in the territorial treasury. Whenever a grand or petit jury is to be drawn to serve at any term of a district court, the judge of such district shall give public notice of the time and place of the drawing of such jury, which shall be at least twelve days before the commencement of such term; and on the day and at the place thus fixed the judge of such district shall hold an open session of his court, and shall preside at the drawing of such jury; and the clerk of such court shall write the name of each person on the jury-lists returned and filed in his office upon a separate slip of paper as nearly as practicable of the same size and form, and all such slips shall, by the clerk in open court, be placed in a covered box, and thoroughly mixed and mingled; and thereupon the United States marshal, or his deputy, shall proceed to fairly draw by lot from said box such number of names as may have previously been directed by said judge; and if both a grand and petit jury are to drawn, the grand jury shall be drawn first; and when the drawing shall have been concluded, the clerk of the district court shall issue a venire to the marshal or his deputy, directing him to summon the persons so drawn, and the same shall be duly served on each of the persons so drawn at least seven days before the commencement of the term at which they are to serve; and the jurors so drawn and summoned shall constitute the regular grand and petit juries for the term for all cases. And the names thus drawn from the box by the clerk shall not be returned to or again placed in said box until a new jury-list shall be made. If during any term of the district court any additional grand or petit jurors shall be necessary, the same shall be drawn from said box by the United States marshal in open court; but if the attendance of those drawn cannot be obtained in a reasonable time other names may be drawn in the same manner. Each party, whether in civil or criminal cases, shall be allowed three peremptory challenges; and in the trial of any prosecution for adultery, bigamy, or polygamy it shall be a good cause of principal challenge to any juror that he practices polygamy or that he believes in the rightfulness of the same. In criminal cases, the court, and not the jury, shall pronounce the punishment, under the limitation prescribed by law. The grand jury must inquire into the case of every person imprisoned within the district on a criminal charge and not indicted; into the condition and management of the public prisons within the district; and into the willful and corrupt misconduct in office of public officers of every description within the district; and they are also entitled to free access, at all reasonable times, to the public prisons, and to the examination, without charge, of all public records within the district.

SEC. 5. That there shall be appointed by the governor of said Territory one or more notaries public for each organized county, whose term of office shall be two years and until their successors shall be appointed and qualified. The act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah entitled "An act concerning notaries public," approved January 17, 1866, is hereby approved, except the first section thereof, which is hereby disapproved: Provided, That wherever in said act the words "probate judge" or "clerk of the probate court" are used, the words "secretary of the Territory" shall be substituted.

SEC. 6. That the supreme court of said Territory is hereby authorized to appoint commissioners of said court, who shall have and exercise all the duties of commissioners of the circuit courts of the United States, and to take acknowledgments of bail, &c.; and in addition they shall have the same authority as examining and committing magistrates in all cases arising under the laws of said Territory as is now possessed by justices of the peace in said Territory.

SEC. 7. That the common law of England, as the same is defined and modified by the courts of last resort in those States of the United States where the common law prevails, shall be the rule of decision in all the courts of said Territory so far as it is not repugnant to or inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the existing statutes of said Territory.

SEC. 8. That the act of the territorial Legislature of the Territory of Utah entitled "An act in relation to marshals and attorneys," approved March 3, 1852, and all laws of said Territory inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby disapproved. The act of the Congress of the United States entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853, is extended over and shall apply to the fees of like officers in said Territory of Utah.

Mr. CROUNSE. I now renew my point of order upon this bill.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the centennial bill, which was made a special order for to-day.

Mr. POLAND. I do not yield. I am aware of the ruling the Speaker made on a bill in some respects like this. The parliamentary law the Speaker laid down I quite agree is correct. It was not the fault of the Speaker, but what was said by gentlemen in reference to that bill was unfounded in point of fact. It is unfounded in point of fact so far as this bill is concerned. It is not open to any such objection as was made to the other bill and as is made to this bill. The first section provides the marshal of the Territory may appoint some deputies, who shall receive the same fees for serving process the marshal would receive if he served it. The second section provides the district attorney may appoint some assistants, and if they perform any service they shall have the same fees the attorney himself would have. It merely authorizes these two officers to have servants to do a part of their official duty; it adds not a cent to the expense put on the Government. They are paid, if I may so speak, by the piece. They have fees for certain specific services. The law now gives them all to one man. This bill merely authorizes him to employ some servants to perform a part of that service; so that it is not open at all to the objection which was made. And the Speaker was misled in relation to what was said about its creating new offices, which would be a new tax and an additional expense to the Treasury. I certainly do not desire to embarrass the Speaker at all in reference to the ruling he made.

Mr. CROUNSE. Mr. Speaker, this point of order was pretty thoroughly considered at the time this bill, or a similar bill, came from the Committee on the Territories. Several objections were then raised, among which was this one: that the bill provides for the appointment of deputy marshals and deputy district attorneys, and it was urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] that these appointments carried with them the fact that these officers must be paid and provision made by appropriation for their salaries. It does not necessarily follow because they are appointed to discharge certain duties in that Territory their fees must be the same which obtain in any other State or Territory.

The Speaker, too, very justly remarked that an amendment would be germane, whether the bill was silent on the subject or not, as to the rate of fees which were to be fixed; that whether the fees were fixed in the bill or not an amendment would be germane changing the manner of fixing the fees or changing the amount of the fees to be charged. If so, then there can be no doubt it would provide for taking money out of the Treasury of the United States, which would of itself make the bill liable to the point of order.

But, in addition to this, there is a change in this bill which may have escaped the attention of the House. It is this. It transfers into the hands of the United States district attorney and of the United States marshal not only the business which pertains to those offices now, not only that which pertains under any law of the United States, but that under every law on the statute-book of the Territory of Utah, or under any law which may be enacted there. Let it be assault or battery, let it be a selling of liquor against the license law of the Territory of Utah, no matter, indeed, what the offense may be, it provides that in the trial of all such cases the United States attorney shall appear there and prosecute under the laws of the Territory of Utah. It also provides that the marshal shall act as sheriff; that he and his deputies shall swarm through the entire Territory to discharge the duty of sheriff. This people in Utah are not to be allowed the privilege of saying who shall serve their processes or what officers shall prosecute these several cases under their own laws. You will therefore see it necessarily entails upon the United States the payment of a large bill of fees, the same fees which are provided for in disposing of cases where they violate the laws of the United States solely. The same fees are to obtain in every case, whether it be a simple assault and battery case where the fine is five dollars or not. There the United States marshal will be entitled to the exorbitant fees which are provided for, and the United States district attorney will have the exorbitant fees now provided for, or as much greater fees as this House may choose to fix. In this very item it involves the expenditure, I venture to say, of hundreds of thousands of dollars. This bill has been pressed forward by the United States attorney out there, who has been away from his business for long months working in and around this House.

Mr. POLAND. I should like to ask whether the general merits of the bill are open to discussion under a point of order?

Mr. CROUNSE. I will pass from that.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Does the gentleman from Nebraska say that the mileage of the marshal will be more than that of a constable or sheriff, or any other officer who is to perform these duties?

Mr. MILLS. I will answer the gentleman that it will be.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I say respectfully to the gentleman that he is mistaken.

Mr. MILLS. I will tell you why it is.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. It is the same mileage precisely.

Mr. CROUNSE. Let me be understood. In ordinary cases these are now to be paid by parties in counties of Utah, but under this bill the fees of whatever character are to be paid by the United States.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Yes; but it is relatively the same; the same per mile, and the same percentage. If a county were three hundred miles long it would be the same there as three hundred miles in a Territory.

Mr. MILLS. The same per mile.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. There are counties in the State of New York one hundred miles long.

Mr. CROUNSE. The bill provides that "the United States attorney shall be entitled to the same fees for services rendered by said assistants as he would be entitled to for the same services if rendered by himself." To that provision of the bill it would be germane for any member to move that the United States attorney should be entitled to double the amount of these fees, or to half the amount.

Mr. POLAND. I withdraw the bill for the present.

SUMNER MEMORIAL ADDRESSES.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed three thousand copies for the use of the Senate and five thousand copies for the use of the House of Representatives of the addresses made in the Senate and in the House of Representatives upon the death of Hon. Charles Sumner, and that the Secretary have printed the portrait of Mr. Sumner to accompany the same.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORTS ON IMMIGRATION.

Mr. DONNAN. On Friday last the House ordered the printing of three thousand additional copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of January 21, 1874, with accompanying reports, concerning the immigration service. The Public Printer reports that it is necessary to reset the type, so that the printing will cost more than the $500, which is the limit of the printing that may be ordered by the House without the concurrence of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be permitted so to alter the form of the resolution that it shall be a concurrent resolution and that it shall be sent to the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent that the river and harbor appropriation bill now in the Committee on Appropriations be reprinted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the centennial-celebration bill, which has been made a special order in Committee of the Whole for to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2986) to appropriate $3,000,000 in aid of the centennial celebration and international exhibition of 1876.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be read.

The bill was read. It appropriates the sum of $3,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, toward defraying the expenses of the national centennial celebration and international exhibition, to be held under the auspices of the Government of the United States in the year 1876, as provided for in the act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American independence, by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mines, in the city of Philadelphia, and State of Pennsylvania, in the year 1876," and the act approved June 1, 1872, entitled "An act relative to the centennial international exhibition to be held in the city of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, in the year 1876;" said $3,000,000 to be drawn from the Treasury and applied as follows: Whenever it shall be certified to the Secretary of the Treasury by an officer of the United States Engineer Corps, to be detailed for the purpose as hereinafter provided, that the sum of $100,000 or more shall have been expended in the erection of buildings, preparation of the grounds, or other necessary expenditures for said celebration and exhibition, by the corporations created by the acts hereinbefore referred to, the Secretary of the Treasury is thereby authorized to issue a warrant to the Treasurer of the United States in favor of the president of the centennial board of finance created by the said act of Congress of June 1, 1872, for the payment of a sum equal to 40 per cent. of the sum so certified to have been expended; provided, however, that no part of the money thereby appropriated shall be paid as compensation to or for the personal expenses of the centennial commissioners or directors of the centennial board of finance.

The bill in its second section authorizes the President of the United States to detail, from the Engineer Corps of the Army, a competent officer, whose duty it shall be to take an account of the expenditures for the preparation of the grounds, the erection of the buildings, and other necessary expenses for said celebration and exhibition, and at the close of each month to certify the same to the Secretary of the Treasury as thereinbefore provided. No part of the money therein appropriated shall be paid prior to the 1st day of July, 1874, and no more than $2,000,000 shall be paid during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and the remainder of said $3,000,000 shall be paid during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am suffering so extremely from pain and debility that I must ask the gentlemen of the committee to give me a quiet hearing on what I regard as a great cause, relating equally not only to every State, but to each congressional district in every State. The bill proposes a small appropriation in aid of a measure to which the national honor has been committed by both the legislative and the executive departments of the Government.

The question is not a new one. Congress committed itself upon it by the act of March 3, 1871, which provided for "holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine," and required the President to appoint a commission consisting of one member from each State and each Territory to prepare and superintend the execution of a plan for holding the exhibition. The title of that bill is:

An act to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American independence, by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, in the city of Philadelphia, and State of Pennsylvania, in the year 1876.

The preamble provides that the events of which the centennial period will then recur—

Shall be commemorated by an exhibition of the natural resources of the country and their development, and of its progress in those arts which benefit mankind in comparison with those of older nations.

The first section provides—

That an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures shall be held.

Section 6 directs the commission, which the act authorizes the President to appoint, to make certain regulations; and among others—

The requisite custom-house regulations for the introduction into this country of the articles from foreign countries intended for exhibition.

And the eighth section, among other things, provided that—

The President shall, through the Department of State, make proclamation of the same, setting forth the time at which the exhibition will open and the place at which it will be held; and he shall communicate to the diplomatic representatives of all nations copies of the same, together with such regulations as may be adopted by the commissioners for publication in their respective countries.

But is this all Congress has done? No, sir. By the act of June 1, 1872, it reaffirmed the act to which I have referred and affirmed all that the commissioners and the Government had done in pursuance of its provisions. It also further provided the manner in which the people should contribute funds in aid of the international exhibition it had provided for.

So far has the legislative department of the Government gone. How far has the executive department gone? First, the President has constituted the commission, and transmitted its first and second annual reports to Congress. Second, he has by his proclamation of July 3, 1873, announced to the nations of the world the action of Congress and the results of the labors of the commission so far as the selection of the site for and the time of opening and closing the international exhibition were concerned, and cordially commended it to the consideration of all nations. Third, he has through the State Department communicated his proclamation and the regulations established by the commission to all nations with which we have diplomatic or consular relations, in terms so cordial that thirteen of them have accepted the nation's invitation and promised to be present and participate in the commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of its independence by participating in the exhibition. And the artists, the manufacturers, and citizens of other countries have manifested their interest in it and their desire to exhibit to our people their best productions in competition with our best productions. The governments that have accepted the invitation are Belgium, the Netherlands, Germany, Switzerland, Ecuador, Chili, the Argentine Confederation, Brazil, Hayti, Liberia, Hawaii, Mexico, and Sweden. In addition to this list of acceptances, says the secretary of the commission in a communication of April 30, "we have communications from citizens, artists, and manufacturers in France, England, Scotland, Wales, Italy, Spain, Turkey, Austria, Russia, Egypt, China, Japan, Australia, New Zealand, and Canada, indicating their interest in the exhibition and their purpose to be represented." To this list I am now authorized to add Persia.

And, sir, lastly the President, on the 25th of February last, by a special message to the two Houses of Congress, invoked national aid for the project, saying that "a failure in this enterprise would be deplorable."

In view of these commitments before the world can we recede, or in view of the fact that the exhibition is to be under the eye of the world, can we permit it to be shorn of any dimension or attribute demanded by the dignity and honor of our country? I think we cannot, and I do not believe that Congress will agree that it shall be. I have said that the bill proposes a small appropriation. Three million dollars sounds like a large sum, yet I am justified in speaking of it as a small appropriation for this great enterprise by the remarks of my distinguished friend from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] who on former occasions admonished you that the commission would come here clamoring for $10,000,000, and others here and elsewhere have named much larger sums. It is small, sir, when tested by what Pennsylvania and her people and municipalities have done. They have already provided a much larger sum in support of the national honor thus widely and repeatedly committed. It is small in comparison with what France has appropriated for either of her international exhibitions, and what the government of England applied to either of hers. And it is infinitely small in comparison with the expenditure made by the government of Austria in support of the late exhibition at Vienna. Yet, Mr. Chairman, it will be sufficent for the purpose.

I have here an elaborate statement of the expenditures and resources, the cost of the buildings having been calculated from the bids of competent men for the work of construction. It is as follows:

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION, PHILADELPHIA, 1876.

Statement of estimated expenses and receipts and cost of buildings, based upon bids actually received for the work:

Main pavilion.

Built upon the plan of Messrs. Vaux & Radford, of New York, and including within itself offices for the management, foreign and State commissioners, sanitary arrangements, and restaurants, which at many other exhibitions have required separate buildings:

First. If constructed with the principal arches, the roof purlins, and the gables in wood, but lined inside with galvanized iron to the height of sixty feet, and with the roof covered with corrugated iron, the cost will be $103,996 per acre.

For a building covering thirty acres we have total cost, at $103,996 per acre, exclusive of contingencies	$3,119,880

Second. If constructed upon the same plan and design, but of reduced dimension, the arches and the framing to be of iron, the roof to be covered with corrugated iron and the interior lining to be of the same material as in No. 1, with fronts of brick, and iron, the cost will be $182,000 per acre.

For a building covering 18.47 acres we have, at $182,000	$3,362,000
*Less, at $25,000	461,750
	2,900,250

Machinery hall.

A separate structure, covering seven acres, built with wrought-iron columns, to carry iron roof-trusses and purlins. Roof covered with corrugated iron, lined with a non-condensing material; walls of brick and iron. The cost will be $128,000 per acre. The amount from the sale of the structure will be $25,000 per acre.

For a building covering seven acres we have, at $128,000	$896,000
Less, at $25,000	175,000
	721,000

Agricultural hall.

A separate building, covering four acres, and similar in construction to the machinery hall.

For a building covering four acres we have, at $128,000	$512,000
Less, at $25,000	100,000
	412,000

Horticultural department.

Conservatory, greenhouse, &c., as per report of the National Centennial Horticultural Society	$200,000

Water supply, drainage, and sewerage.

Sanitary arrangements, &c., exclusive of those in main pavilion	$230,000
Grading of walks, roads, places of waiting for carriages, planting, &c.	300,000
Fencing, railroad communications, and provisionary buildings	200,000
Telegraph, gas, expenses of the building, office, and incidentals for two and a half years	300,000
	1,030,000

Expenses of the general administration.

For three years	$500,000

Summary of expenditures.

Main pavilion	$3,362,000
Machinery hall	896,000
Agricultural hall	512,000
Horticultural department	200,000
Building for the fine arts, painting, statuary, &c.	500,000
Water, gas, grading, fencing, and railroad facilities	1,030,000
General administration	500,000
Add 25 per cent. for errors in estimates and general contingencies	1,750,000
	8,750,000

The building for the fine arts above named is to be created by the State of Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia, and for that purpose $1,500,000 has been appropriated. It is to be under the exclusive control of the United States commission, and is to remain as a museum for the State. It is placed in the estimate at the cost of $500,000, because it will save the commission that amount of expenditure. The remaining million will add to the imposing character of the exhibition buildings.

Capital actually secured.

Subscriptions up to the date of former statement, March 16	$1,574,440
Subscribed by citizens of Philadelphia since that date up to April 3	150,000
Additional subscription guaranteed by responsible citizens of Philadelphia	250,000
State of Pennsylvania and city of Philadelphia, for the art building	500,000
Appropriation by ordinance of Philadelphia, April 2, 1874	1,000,000
State of New Jersey	100,000
Total	3,574,440
Proposed contribution by Congress	3,000,000
Total	6,574,440

*The amount to be realized from the sale of the structure will be $25,000 per acre.

Estimated resources.

Additional subscriptions on a programme for Pennsylvania, exclusive of Philadelphia, about $40,000 of which was subscribed before the beginning of the panic, and not included in the above statement	$150,000
Additional subscription in city of Philadelphia	150,000
Subscriptions from New York, New England, the West, and other sections	500,000
Estimated receipts from the exhibition	2,500,000
Sale of materials	500,000
Total receipts	10,374,440
Total expenditures	8,750,000

The above balance may be treated as guaranteeing creditable success.

WASHINGTON, March 16, 1874.
Revised April 4, 1874.

Sir, I venture the prediction that the results of this celebration and exhibition will prove that Congress has never made a more productive investment than this $3,000,000 will be. I have said that its influence will be felt in every State and in every congressional district, and I reaffirm it; for it will stimulate our commerce, improve and increase our manufactures, and give new and grand impulses to the agricultural interests of the country.

I have before me a very philosophical work by Daniel Grant, who has recently been chosen to grace the British Parliament. It is entitled "Home Politics or the Growth of Trade," and was published in London in 1870. In the consideration of the varied causes influencing trade and production he takes up that of international exhibitions; and I wish to invite your attention to his statement of the influence of the English exhibitions of 1851 and 1862. He says, on pages 32, 33, and 34:

> Let us now pass to the considerations of the influences that exhibitions are supposed to have exercised on trade. At the opening of the exhibition of 1851 the whole of the circumstances that could produce a successful result were brought freely into play. Imperial pageantry, international courtesy, and diplomatic suavity were all made to aid in the development of a royal idea; and the success of the exhibition, simply as an exhibition, was unequaled. Not only as a mere show was the effort successful; its influence on trade was also very large. For the first time in history nations were invited from all parts of the world to take part in rendering homage to mere commercial pursuits; and for the first time it was proclaimed as a principle that trade was paramount. Dreams of universal peace and universal brotherhood were largely indulged in, until they were disturbed by the rude utterances of war.
> Yet with all this there were some results that were left unchallenged. The exhibition ennobled commerce; men from various parts of the world had learned to look upon trade, and more particularly English trade, from a point of view they had never previously approached, and the result was that trading relations were not only cemented, but extended. The ideas associated with our palace of industry were those of royalty, wealth, and elegance, and all these were aided by the very structure of the building, as it rose in its fragile beauty, spanning the noble trees and looking out to the clear sky beyond. To ourselves as well as to others it was a great lesson, the influence of which has not yet died out. It taught us not only what we could, but what we could not do, and it placed before us by illustrations, stronger than any language, how much inferior our art productions were to those of our compeers; and from that teaching has emanated our South Kensington museum and our present demand for technical education.
> All these things influence trade, both directly and indirectly. In an earlier part of this chapter it was pointed out that the personal knowledge of buyer and seller forms an important link in the growth of trade, and in one sense the first exhibition aided this. Men who for years had known each other by name came to know each other as a matter of fact, and thus built up relations that produced a mutual good. The mere prestige of the "world's bazaar" brought men from every quarter of the habitable world, and they carried away with them to their distant homes the memory of English productions that bore fruit then and has borne fruit since. At the time, among the whole of our manufacturers, it was recognized as an unchallengeable fact, that the exhibition had stimulated trade, that orders were plentiful, and that its success was great.
> The statistics do more than bear this point out, the bound in our exports is both clear and decisive. It will be necessary to notice here that the direct results of the exhibition would not be manifest until the year after it closed, and would most probably extend twelve months beyond. If the exhibition did not close until the end of the year the orders given during the time would be delivered partly in the year 1851 and partly in 1852, and the return orders some months later, so that the effects would appear in the following years. The statistics here given show very markedly the growth of our exports at the particular epochs:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Our exports in 1851 were | £74,448,722 |
> | Our exports in 1852 were | 78,076,854 |
> | Our exports in 1853 were | 98,933,781 |
> Showing an advance in the two years of £24,485,059.
> The same results are apparent in the two years after our second exhibition:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Our exports in 1862 were | £123,992,264 |
> | Our exports in 1863 were | 146,602,342 |
> | Our exports in 1864 were | 160,449,053 |
> Showing an advance in the two years of £36,456,789.
> In looking at these figures it must be remembered that the results here manifested embrace the action of other causes besides that of the exhibition. For instance, in 1851 the furore of the gold fever in Australia was in full force, and there was also flowing from our shores the great emigration that followed the Irish famine. Both these causes would combine to swell the returns of 1852-'53. At the second exhibition another influence was at work, the results of which are quite as manifest, namely, the operations brought into play in connection with limited liability.

Sir, this exhibition, if commensurate with the resources of the country, will stimulate immigration as no event has ever done. It will also change the character of a vast percentage of the immigrants. It will be largely attended by skilled mechanics and artisans who will come from foreign lands to study the objects to be exhibited. Many hundreds of such must come. A distinguished American exhibitor at Vienna, whose goods went into competition with those of Whitworth and the leading mechanicians and engineers of the world, told me that the exhibition of the productions of his shop had cost him more than $15,000. "How so, sir?" I asked. "Why," said he, "I had to take with me the men most skilled of all in the country for setting up our machine tools; I had also to take with me picked men from our shops to run them while under exhibition, and had to pay their wages as though they had been at work at home, together with their traveling expenses." I put the question to him, "Will such be the case with those who may exhibit at Philadelphia in 1876?" "It must, inevitably," said he. "They could not trust to our young country with undeveloped industries as well as we might have trusted to find competent workmen in the workshops of Europe; they must bring them with them." And, sir, what will be the effect? These men in their native lands can look forward to nothing but work at wages throughout their lives. Let them come here and behold, as they will under one roof, and that roof their daily abode during the months they will remain here, illustrations of the resources of our country lying all undeveloped as they are over the greater part of the country; they will also learn how free our land, mineral and agricultural, is; they will see proofs that oceans of water-power are running to waste in the midst of the vast mineral resources of Virginia, of Carolina, of Alabama, of Georgia, of the Western States, and of the Pacific slope, and you will find organizations of these skilled workingmen ready to go into those rich fields of promise and start little workshops and utilize these resources, these almost untouched fields, incalculable in wealth, where they may hope to rear from little forges and founderies and smithshops vast works such as now characterize our older States, and such as those in other lands in which they acquired their arts, mysteries, and trades.

Nor will the influence of the exhibition be less potent on the agricultural communities of the world. They know nothing of our free lands, and of our progress in civilization, save what they learn through correspondence with those who have boldly ventured before them into what the most of them regard as our untried wilderness. That gentlemen may form something like an adequate estimate of the value of such immigrants, I submit the following remarks from the last annual report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics:

> From the foregoing considerations, therefore, the sum of $800 seems to be the full average capital value of each immigrant. At this rate those who landed upon our shores during the year just closed added upward of $285,000,000 to our national wealth, while during the last half century the increment from this source exceeds $6,243,880,800. It is impossible to make an intelligent estimate of the value to the country of those foreign-born citizens who brought their educated minds, their cultivated tastes, their skill in the arts, and their inventive genius. In almost every walk of life their influence has been felt. Alike in the fearful ordeal of war and in the pursuits of peace, in our legislative halls, and in the various learned professions, the adopted sons of America have attained eminence. Among the many who rendered timely aid to our country during the late war, it may seem invidious to mention a single name, except for the purpose of illustration. In 1839 there arrived at the port of New York, in the steamship British Queen, which sailed from the port of London, a Swedish immigrant, better known as Captain John Ericsson. What was his value to the country, as estimated on the 9th day of March, 1862? Was it eight hundred, eight hundred thousand, or eight million dollars?

My hour will be too brief to elaborate this point. The facts are overwhelming. He who will barely consider them must feel that he is invited by this bill to make an investment which shall be remunerative beyond human conception. I may, however, return to this point in another connection.

But I desire to say that while this bill appeals to our cupidity and our hope of the development of our national resources, it appeals to me with far higher, more noble motives. Let us once more remind ourselves and show the world that our old motto, "E pluribus unum," still has a vital significance. The American States, as States, have never appeared in an international exhibition. At London, at Paris, at Vienna there was an "American department," containing a few specimens from a few of our States. There was nothing there to tell the people of Europe that we were thirty-seven States in one Union. There was nothing there to tell the visitors at those exhibitions anything of our vast territories and their boundless wealth out of which more States are yet to be carved. It was "the American department."

Here on our own soil, if generous emulation animates us, if we shall be stimulated by that wholesome rivalry which gives warmth to fraternal affection, he who comes from another land will see our political organization and our geography written in the very form and construction of the building. Let us, forgetting all past differences, rally together, breast to breast and heart to heart as a united people, challenging the world to generous controversy. Let us ally ourselves, men of the North and of the South, as our fathers did for war a century ago, and win a peaceful triumph that shall redound to the honor of our country as grandly and enduringly as did the victories achieved in war by our fathers. Let us also make this centennial year a year of jubilee, in which we shall proclaim to the world that though when the century began slavery was coextensive with our whole country, to-day no slave can breathe our atmosphere; that at the close of the bloodiest internecine struggle that history records, or within ten years after its close, there is no state-prisoner within our limits, no citizen under banishment, no citizen disfranchised for aught else than crime not of a political character after conviction by his peers and the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction. Let us thus prove to them that republicanism is peace and order and liberty; and that a single century of it, though it has not erased the word treason from our statute-book, has rendered it an obsolete term in the estimation of every American jurist.

These are the ends, the accomplishment of which animates me and the patriotic people of the State I in part represent. And herein, Mr. Chairman, I find the promise of the richest reward and the highest returns the American people will receive from the pitiful appropriation this bill proposes. Mr. Chairman, we are painfully ignorant of each other and of our own material resources. It has been my privilege, for I have rambled far and wide in the hope of restoration to health, to visit and mingle with the people of thirty-four States of our Union and of most of the Territories, and I have learned something more than falls to the lot of most of us of the resources of our country.

We wonder that foreigners do not know more about them, and yet how ignorant we are ourselves. Who upon this floor, not being an Alabamian or a citizen of the Gulf States, can define the four natural, industrial regions into which the State of Alabama is divided? I apprehend that not ten northern men among us know that such well-defined regions exist. Sir, her cotton region, her timber region, her grain region, and her mineral region are each distinct and well defined, and each would be regarded as an empire in itself in Europe.

Who of us twelve years ago had any idea of the marvelous iron regions of the upper lakes? In 1860 I scrutinized, as a matter of curiosity, a specimen of Marquette iron-ore. Last summer, when with my venerable friend Henry C. Carey I visited that region, we stood awe-stricken beside the vast masses of ore that had been uncovered—ore capable, like that of Pilot Knob and of North Carolina, of being converted into Danemora iron, the best bar-iron that Norway or Sweden sends to any country.

Who knows the extent or value of that deposit of coal, which science declares to be more nearly pure carbon than any other that has yet been discovered, which lies in and around Clay County, Indiana, and is alike accessible to the iron-workers of Michigan and Missouri and to the ores from both regions and from Western Pennsylvania? When in 1867 I alluded to these coal-fields, and announced upon this floor that the neighborhood of Brazil, Indiana, was to be the center of an iron region greater than that of England herself, her own Representative interrogated me as to whether I had not fallen into a wild exaggeration. But who that travels through that country now doubts if in little more than five years the whole country side has been blackened with smoke and interlaced with railroads connecting these rich coal and iron fields with the country at large, that ere a generation shall have passed that pure carbon, so accessible to every variety of iron-ore, will have made that region the greatest home of iron and steel workers in this country?

Let me call your attention to a very minute subject. Four years or more ago, as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, I had to consider the question of taking off the duty on silk-worm eggs—what more minute article of commerce than silk-worm eggs—and we found it to be the fact that France and Italy, from the time of the opening of the Central and Union Pacific Railroads, had imported across our country $20,000,000 worth of these articles scarcely larger than a small needle's eye. The railroad companies had to give bond when they received the articles at the Pacific coast, and then come to Washington to be freed from the bonds when they entered the ship to cross the Atlantic.

Sir, why does that $20,000,000 of produce of China and Japan cross our country? Have we no silk fields? Why, sir, Arkansas is one wide, natural silk field. There is not a bog in the State too damp nor a hill too high to be graced by the mulberry tree. That character of mulberry most cherished in France, Italy, and other European silk-growing countries is indigenous to every part of the State. Gentlemen of the South, you will not doubt this statement, for is there one of your States that may not put your children to work upon the leaves of trees already grown and bring to your States some part of this $20,000,000? Is there one of your States that may not assist in making silk cheap to the people of the whole country by competing in this beautiful industry—the rearing of the worm, its development, and the reeling and spinning of the raw silk?

What gentleman on this floor can tell me where to look in our country for a field of chalcedony more marvelous in its extent and beauty than that which has made the little village of Chalcedon a household word among the lovers of art in every land? Through long centuries that deposit was the sole known bed, and from it the white and almost lustrous clay took its name. Yet, having referred to Arkansas, I turn to her again, and tell you that lying within the flow of the water of her hot springs are beds of chalcedony more pure and more vast than that at Chalcedon.

We, the representatives of the American people, know but little of these things. Why shall we not learn something of our own resources? Why shall not each State, entering into generous rivalry, challenge all others to show an equal display of native resources for works of art or of utility? Why shall not each come forward and show the best productions of its industry, and, though she may have been laggard, give proof that she too is on the march to perfection and triumph; that she too will war, within the bounds of peace, for the ascendency of American art, industry, and commerce?

Sir, about eighteen months ago I happened into Kansas City; and I found an annual county fair had just closed. I read its catalogue of articles exhibited and examined the few remaining specimens. Among them—gentlemen, you may not be prepared to believe it—among them were specimens of lead from more than three hundred distinct deposits. There were also specimens of iron, copper, zinc, nickel, indeed of all the useful ores. And where these are all found there is always a certain percentage of silver and gold. But the useful minerals are a richer treasure to Missouri than mines of gold and silver could be.

Where, sir, let me ask, may we go with surest hope of finding the red ruby and the blue sapphire in greatest purity and size? To no foreign land. Our own fields, scarcely broken, have outrivaled all the exhausted fields of other lands. You go to-day in search of rubies and sapphires to the mountain wilds of North Carolina, and in corundum beds, richer than any others known to the world, you find them in more than their due proportions as reported by science. Who at home or abroad knows these facts? Again I say, shall we not enter into generous rivalry to learn what each of us has to show from our respective State or Territory?

I will not dwell upon the prolific fields of California, of grain or gold. I will not pause to describe the groves that surround her southern homes, around which the orange and the chestnut, strangers in our northern climes, bloom and fructify together; where the olive, the hazel, the English walnut, the fig, the peach, the pear, the plum, hang with the lemon, the lime, and the citron, embowering one home, a visit to which is still fresh in my memory. I leave these in the hope that some gentleman from the Pacific coast will tell the story of their beauty and their affluence. But I pause to say that California has in her mountains—those of San Bernardino—tin mines as vast, as pure, and as easily worked as any mines in the world, of the one metal in which we have been supposed to be deficient. I have seen the ore, the pigs of metal, and the ware manufactured therefrom. And it is only the cost of transportation over the mountains to the sea-side that prevents the working of that wonderful deposit for commercial purposes. That will come one of these days; and nothing would attract the Cornishmen of England to this country so largely as specimens of tin from that wonderful mine.

Who in our whole country, who even that dwells in the particular region, can tell me the mineral deposits, their variety, their extent, their richness, that fill the valleys around Chattanooga? We used to talk of those valleys as in the cotton States. Why, sir, the mineral region—Southwestern Virginia, East Tennessee, Northern Alabama, North Carolina, and Georgia—the mountain regions of those States will be a marvel to the representative of any other mineral district in the world. The richest ores lie there in geological incongruity as though nature, pressed for space in which to put them, had forgotten her own laws when making these deposits.

Come, let us learn something of these things. Foreigners are ready to teach us all they know. It was said to me by one of the gentlemen from the Lower Gulf States, "We have nothing to exhibit." Ah, sir, I reply to him, had you nothing else, you have your capacity of producing the ramie plant. Italy has pledged herself to come and teach you how to work it from the stem to the finished dress at the exhibition. Among the latest applications for space is one which justifies this statement.

Now, gentlemen, see what Austria and Italy propose to do:

> The Austrian minister of education will appeal to the Emperor for authority to make an extensive exhibition of whatever pertains to his department. The Marquis of Bute is arranging a collection of metals and minerals from his estates in Wales and England. From Italy the proposal comes to make an educational and entirely novel exhibition of the ramie rheea, or China grass, in all states of its preparation, from the growing plant to the finished material in garments of the finest texture, also mixed with silk-alpaca. As this plant grows most luxuriantly in the Southern States and California, and is a perennial and requires little care after the first two years, it promises to become a most important staple of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the patience of the House is I fear exhausted, and I am quite sure my own strength is. I would gladly, for my whole soul is involved in giving grandeur to this jubilee year—this year, in which all the world shall find us a united and a happy people, engaged in a strife ever profitable, ever beneficent, for industrial ascendency—ill as I am I would, I say, gladly engage the attention of the House for a longer period; but I must close. In doing so I invoke for this cause the spirit of the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] who challenged us to know each other and to love each other; who asked us of the North to cast aside our seeming suspicion and distrust, and who pledged the South to a course of generous and trustful confidence.

Let us have the celebration and exhibition. Let us inaugurate it under the American flag in the neighborhood of Independence Hall, in the midst of scenes that shall revive those memories which would have been our common heritage had the fortunes of war divided us into two peoples. Let us there, under that flag, each in the name of his own State, as I have already said, say to the people of the whole world, "E pluribus unum. We are many in one. You may excel any one of us, but in our Union we challenge comparison with all the world besides and will share in common the glory of our country's triumphs."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to reply to what has fallen from the lips of the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] upon the grandeur of the American Republic, and its wonderful growth in population and wealth and in the arts and sciences. He is always eloquent when so speaking, and I have listened to-day with pleasure, as I always do when he unfolds the glories that our flag covers. But there are certain things, Mr. Chairman, in reference to this appropriation of $3,000,000 which should be presented fairly and candidly to Congress, and fairly and candidly through Congress to the people of the United States.

I rise, sir, to oppose this appropriation. I do it for two general reasons, or rather two things move me and urge me in this direction. In the first place I look at the condition of the country, the financial situation we are now confronting face to face. I behold a depleted Treasury. We have fallen behind since the 1st day of July, 1873. The payment of the public debt, popular over and above all other things to the majority of the American people, has ceased because the revennes have fallen off. I behold looming on the near horizon increased taxation, or if that does not come, Congress has settled that the only way to avoid it is by paring down expenditures on subject-matters which have heretofore been considered indispensable. I behold enterprises of great moment languishing because we cannot "shore" them up and give them a practical Godspeed in money from the public Treasury. I behold, as every man must, a session of Congress in which a large part of the best ability of both Houses concedes that wherever it is practicable to stop the expenditure of money it should be done. Men may differ as to the place, but the proposition I have heard very rarely if ever controverted.

Then, sir, another thing moves me. I was here in this House when this enterprise first saw the light. I remember its feeble days. I remember when a Pennsylvanian introduced it and when it had no friend, and when in order that it might gain congressional recognition, that it might be placed upon the rolls of our statutes as an enterprise that Congress would charter, and no more, as it does hundreds of other things, gentlemen from Pennsylvania joined in the most solemn pledges that if Congress would give this enterprise merely its formal sanction, then it should go no further; and it was incorporated in the body of the law that under no circumstances should Congress ever be called upon for a dollar of money in aid of it. These things, sir, have not been swept from my mind; and remembering them, and hearing as I do day after day the assertion that we should appropriate money because we are committed and have gone too far to return, remembering as I do how we were committed in the other direction, I cannot sit still and allow this measure to be urged, to be teased, to be importuned through the House, and not lift my voice in what I mean shall be fair expostulation.

Sir, what is the record on this project? I call the attention of the House to it. And if gentlemen have not investigated fully and thoroughly as to its history as bearing upon this much-urged proposition that we have gone too far to recede and are committed to pay the bills of the centennial, it is worth while for them to listen to what I will have read from the Clerk's desk showing the history of this enterprise. It came up first in the year 1870, and I ask the attention of the committee to that fact. Mind you, I am going back to the time when its projectors pledged themselves that they never would be here in the attitude of asking money. And, sir, I am not going back to the misty past. I am not going back to a date that is outlawed by the statute of limitations. I am not going back to a time between now and which have elapsed so many years that times have changed and argumentation has changed and action should change. But I go no further back than a little more than three years ago. Probably a fourth of the members of this House were members at that time. I do not know but I am overstating this, but there are a great many gentlemen about me whom I recognize as having been here at that time; and when the record is read they will recall what was then the sentiment of the House. It came in here December 14, 1870. It was reported by Mr. Morrell, of Pennsylvania, a member, and I believe chairman of the Committee on Manufactures. At that time some discussion was raised with reference to the future of the bill, and I ask the Clerk to take volume 82 of the Globe, which I have sent to him, and read from page 108, giving the name of the member who speaks, before he reads certain remarks which were made at that time, indicating the temper both of the House and the projectors of the enterprise.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ALLISON. There is another feature to which I desire to call attention. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] says that it is proposed that Philadelphia and Pennsylvania shall pay the expenses of this exhibition. Now, if that be true, I trust it will be so distinctly declared in this bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is.

Mr. WELKER. Where?

Mr. ALLISON. I have examined the bill with some care, and I can find nothing of the kind in it. If we are to incur liability under the bill let us know in advance what that liability is; but I can find nothing in this bill which limits the liability of the United States except that no compensation shall be paid to the commissioners. These are all the suggestions I desire to make in reference to this bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman will observe that the eighth section provides that whenever the President shall be informed by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings for the purpose, and for the exclusive control by the commission herein provided for of the proposed exhibition, he shall take the action contemplated.

Mr. ALLISON. But the gentleman from Ohio will observe that the State of Pennsylvania and the city authorities of Philadelphia are required to provide only a place for the meeting of this commission.

Mr. WELKER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow us to put in a proviso that the expenses incurred under this act shall be borne by the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. MORRELL, of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is all on that point. Here, then, the matter first struck Congress. It was introduced in a bill providing for a commission to manage and control this celebration. But directly attention was called to the fact that there might under this be at some future time a claim for a congressional appropriation—the point was raised by Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. Morrell, managing the bill, stated there that he had no objection to a restriction being put into the bill. We shall see before we get through that it was put in. I have gone back to that discussion because I want to be exhaustive on this point, and I wish gentlemen to see that everybody then who took an interest in this matter repudiated the idea that Congress should ever be called upon to pay a dollar. The bill passed over at that time and came up again on January 4, when the discussion was continued, and one of the Representatives from Philadelphia, my friend Mr. O'NEILL, who sits on my right, made a speech, in which he enunciated the same proposition as to expenditure of money upon this bill, saying in terms that the question of money was a thing that Congress need not give itself any trouble about.

And now, if the Clerk will turn to page 306 of the same volume of the Congressional Globe, volume 82, he will find where the opposition to this future claim upon Congress crystallized itself in the form of an amendment, offered by Mr. SARGENT, of California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following amendment to the bill:

In line 2, section 7, strike out all after the word "commissioners" to the end of the section, and insert "or other officers provided by this act, out of the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There was the proposition made by one of the most able, intelligent, active, and working members of the House, now a Senator from the State of California, to forever put at rest the question of the payment by the Government of salaries connected with this celebration or exposition, or whatever you choose to call it. More or less discussion took place as to the place, as to the general scope; but nothing in any way contravening or qualifying this direct assumption on the part of Congress that no money should ever be paid for the centennial machinery. It came up again on January 16, when final action of the House was had upon the proposition to incorporate this centennial commission. I ask the Clerk to read from pages 422 and 423 what I have marked, in order that the House may see what was the final upshot of the discussion on the birth of this project.

The Clerk read as follows:

The question next recurred on the following, moved as a substitute by Mr. Morrell, of Pennsylvania, for the amendment of Mr. SARGENT:

"Add after the word 'commission' on the ninth line of the seventh section the words:

"Provided, That the total sum to be expended by said commission for all purposes whatever shall not exceed $50,000 a year, up to January, 1876, and during the year 1876 shall not exceed $250,000, or a total sum of $500,000 during the entire existence of the commission."

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. SARGENT, as follows:

"Strike out all after the word 'commissioners' in line 2, section 7, and insert 'or other officers provided by this act, from the Treasury of the United States;' so that it will read:

"SEC. 7. Be it further enacted, That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners, or other officers provided by this act, from the Treasury of the United States."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There the House left it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I call attention to what the Clerk has just read, not only as to the amendment of Mr. SARGENT, cutting off the payment of the expenses of officials, but also—and it is more significant—to the other amendment, offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which the House voted down, that $50,000 per year in all should be expended up to January 1, 1876, and that up to the end of that year not more than $500,000 should be expended. What did the House do with that proposition? Why, it voted it down, sir. It at once sent it from this Hall with its disapprobation stamped upon it. It rejected a proposition involving only $500,000. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] who has just spoken tells us now that $3,000,000 is a paltry sum, when three years ago the House negatived a proposition that the entire expenses up to the end of 1876 should be half a million dollars. The gentleman's measurement in money differs from that of others. It may be that his ideas have grown as the scheme has advanced. We have seen that from 1870 to 1874 he has leaped from $500,000 to $3,000,000. How far will he leap from 1874 to 1877, when the unpaid bills come in by thousands and millions? As $3,000,000 now is a small, paltry sum to him, $10,000,000 then will be a little thing.

The centennial bill then went to the Senate and there came up, being reported by the senior Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. CAMERON, upon the 16th of February, 1871. He reported it with an amendment which had been put in in committee, going further than Mr. SARGENT's amendment, and providing that Congress should not be liable for any bills whatever. That is how this project saw the light in the Senate of the United States, a clause having been put in and the senior Senator from Pennsylvania reporting it and asking action on it, that Congress should not be liable to pay any bills. It was discussed, and I ask the Clerk to read the passage I have marked on page 1561 of volume 83 of the Globe.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CAMERON. I only rise to pledge my word that the people of Philadelphia, and it may be the people of Pennsylvania, will give their millions if necessary to make this exhibition creditable not only to Pennsylvania but to the whole United States.

Mr. CONKLING. Then what do you want an act of Congress for?

Mr. CAMERON. We only ask an act of Congress to give it character.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That idea was amplified in the discussion.

Mr. MYERS. I would ask the gentleman if the people of Philadelphia and of Pennsylvania have not given their millions?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman will have his opportunity to reply to me. Three years ago, when this proposition was ushered into the Senate of the United States, reported by the Senator from Pennsylvania with a clause declaring that Congress should never be liable, upon the question being asked, after that Senator had stated that Pennsylvania and Philadelphia would give millions, why he wanted congressional action, his answer was, "Only to give it character."

Sir, we have here a claim for $3,000,000 within the short space of three years from the time of that declaration. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] asks if Pennsylvania and Philadelphia have not given their millions. Does he mean to take half the promise and violate the other half? The promise was not only that Pennsylvania would give her millions, but that she would free Congress by voluntary subscription from any call, and that all she wanted was "character." Pennsylvania, then, or the exhibition, in the view of the Senator, needed character more than she needed money. To-day she storms the doors of Congress, and forgetful of pledges that to an ordinary man involve in the highest degree human character, she clamors for $3,000,000, forgetting and treading into the dust her promises. Which is needed to-day for this enterprise, character or money?

It passed over, and again came up. I ask the Clerk to read, as showing the sentiment of the Senate, indicated by the observations of a disinterested man, what the view was that obtained there. I ask the Clerk to read, from volume 84, page 1682, of the Globe, the remarks of Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think the Senator from Pennsylvania ought to be worried any more about this bill. It simply authorizes the people of Philadelphia, at their own expense, to have a show; and it is a very proper place; and I think that the heart of every American will respond that of all places in this country Philadelphia is the place where this exhibition ought to be held.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Is any man here so wild that he will tell me that the chairman of the Committee on Finance in the Senate of the United States, who more than any other man there is to-day, as he always is and has been during the time he has held that position, grappling with financial questions—to tell me that JOHN SHERMAN at that time, by any stretch of his imagination, could conceive that the Senator from Pennsylvania, that Members from Pennsylvania in this House, that other gentlemen, would be here within three short years clamoring for three millions of money, when he said that the gentleman from Pennsylvania having charge of the bill need not be concerned, that all Pennsylvania asked for was that they might have a celebration, or "a show"—the word is his, not mine—and that nobody would object to that?

How did that act leave the Senate and Congress? Turn, Mr. Clerk, to page 1762 of volume 84 of the Congressional Globe, and read there what I have marked, showing the manner of this egress from that body.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. MORRELL, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the following amendment of the Senate to House bill 1478, to provide for celebrating the hundredth anniversary of American independence, by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and the products of the soil and mine, in the city of Philadelphia, and State of Pennsylvania, in the year 1876:

Add to the bill the following as an additional section:

Section 7. And the United States shall not be liable for any expense attending said exhibition or by reason of the same.

Mr. REEVES. I object.

Mr. MORRELL, of Pennsylvania. I move to suspend the rules to take up and concur in the Senate amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes 35.

Mr. REEVES demanded the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

So (two-thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended, and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is the act under which the centennial celebration obtained life and being. The last thing that we see of it as it leaves the Forty-first Congress, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Morrell) having it in charge, calls up and moves a concurrence in the Senate amendment, which forever forbids Congress, as men believed then, from being called upon to pay any bills connected with this exhibition. Was there good faith in this? Was the gentleman from Pennsylvania, no longer a member of this House, but a man at that time trusted by his fellows, sincere when he called up that amendment and moved concurrence in it in order that he might get his bill through? Or was there at that early day a mental reservation and jesuitical piece of craft by which he saved himself and his conscience and left the way free to come here as they do now? One proposition I put and defy contradiction: without this explicit restriction the measure would have been sent contemptuously out of Congress and would have never more been heard of.

That was the act that gave life to the enterprise by chartering it, which set it going, as we charter hundreds of other things. The next year, in the next Congress, there came up a second proposition cognate to the first, to provide by way of check for a centennial board of finance, a board that, as one of the Pennsylvania gentlemen said in debate, would take charge of and properly expend the money that the people might contribute. That proposition for a centennial board of finance was introduced by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MYERS,] of the Foreign Relations Committee, upon April 28, 1872. Any gentleman can look at the record of that date. I will not ask more reading here. When that proposition came up the first question that arose was by a cautious, practical Pennsylvanian. As reported, there was a provision in the bill that the Treasury Department should print the certificates of stock. I will say, in brief, that the bill provided for subscriptions in the States upon certificates to be issued for small amounts, so that the people generally might subscribe, and that not until after one hundred days should any State be allowed to contribute or subscribe more than its share.

There was a provision that the Treasury Department should print the certificates; and an eminent gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFIELD,] a cautious and prudent man who did not give up to his State what was meant for the country, arose in his seat and objected to that provision. He thought that even this should not be done by the Government; that the Government should not even involve itself to the extent of a few thousand dollars for printing certificates. We can see what moved him. He was honest. He knew that the State and Congress were pledged that this enterprise should be kept from our doors. He is a man of logical cast, and was led irresistibly to his proposition. The answer was that the provision was necessary in order to afford a better guard against counterfeits, and that it extended no further. If gentlemen will look at pages 2887, 2888 of the Globe for that session they will find the record on this subject, which I do not ask the Clerk to read.

The bill was finally reported from the committee on the 21st of May, 1872, with a clause in it that no liability on the United States Treasury, direct or indirect, should ever be incurred. And so the House passed it. It went to the Senate, where it was called up by Senator CAMERON. I now call attention to this second stage of the measure. I have already taken the House three years back; I now take it back not quite two years. We shall see whether these gentlemen had then changed their ground. I ask the Clerk to read from page 3814, volume 91, of the Congressional Globe.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HAMLIN. It will not happen but once in a hundred years.

Mr. CAMERON. I have only risen to repeat what the Senator from Maine has said, that this will only happen once in a hundred years. Commissioners are selected from every State and Territory in the Union. They go there for the purpose of doing honor to their country. This is the only way in which the money can be raised without expense to the Government. A million people it is expected will each subscribe ten dollars; and thus $10,000,000 will be subscribed. It is necessary to have some responsibility for this. All they ask of the Government is that the Treasury Department shall print their certificates of stock, so that if they are counterfeited the counterfeiters may be punished. They ask nothing else of the Government. There is no doubt they will raise the money.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There, sir, a year after the date of the other extracts that I have read, the Senator from Pennsylvania is again found declaring, upon a bill that cut off the enterprise from Congress, that all that was wanted was that the Treasury Department should print the certificates and the people would raise the money; Pennsylvania would do it; "there was no doubt of it."

Now let us see what another Senator from Pennsylvania said while this bill was pending. I ask the Clerk to read from page 3815. Mr. JOHN SCOTT speaks.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SCOTT. I suppose the Senator from Illinois really desired more to occupy a few moments until the Senate would assemble than to make any serious objection to the passage of this bill. When the subject was first introduced in Congress it was feared that an appropriation would be asked. Everybody in both Houses was so sensitive on that question that an express disavowal of all responsibility on the part of the Government had to be incorporated in the act.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. How many gentlemen in this House remembered this? I had forgotten until I looked up the record that the junior Senator from Pennsylvania has as lately as 1872, less than two years ago, declared that when the matter first came up there was sensitiveness about an appropriation being involved, and they had endeavored to guard the legislation so that this sensitiveness would not be felt. Sir, is there any faith to be given to human promises made legislatively? Or is action taken by the American Congress upon the avowal of men distinguished in virtue and public service to be regarded as nothing, and are we to expect in the future that those very men will rise in their seats within two short years and repudiate all their solemn words and pledges? If that is to be so, then it may well be said that the era of virtuous legislation has ceased; that bad faith has taken possession of public men; and that honor is but a pretense. I do not believe this; I have never believed it; and I do not believe that Congress to-day will by any act so go back upon its record as to condone the offense (I may call it that) of these gentlemen who have now taken the back track.

But the bill passed; and I ask the Clerk to read an extract showing in what form the bill was left when it went from the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

But nothing in this act shall be so construed as to create any liability of the United States direct or indirect, for any debt or obligation incurred nor for any claim by the centennial international exhibition, or the corporation hereby created, for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States in support of any debts or obligations incurred by the corporation herein authorized.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Could human language be plainer? Can safeguards be made more absolute than that? Why was that provision inserted? As Senator SCOTT said, it was to remove the sensitiveness in reference to what is now asked, an appropriation of money. It was on the 1st of June, 1872, that that became the law of the land; and the matter for the time being went out of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I have read with attention and such care as it deserved—and that was great—the report of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] who is the president of the centennial commission. I find him using in that report substantially this language: "Congress having ordered a centennial commission and celebration." I do not know whether the entire phrase is his, but the word "ordered" is there. He says that; and he proceeds to argue that Congress is therefore committed to pay the whole or a part of the expense. Does the record that I have read sound as though Congress had "ordered" an exhibition that it was to pay for? Why, sir, if the debate upon it means nothing, then when a man writes on the back of a piece of negotiable paper "without recourse to John Smith," it means nothing. What did Congress do more or less than the indorser does when he backs a piece of paper with the words "without recourse to the signer?" I look upon human language somewhat differently from the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Now, sir, we have got the centennial out of Congress. Whatever was done was, as some Senator said, that the enterprise might have character with the people, or, as in another place it was said, "in order that there might be a board to take care of the money which the people subscribed."

Now, sir, that is exactly the condition this affair was in then, and if we take a charitable view of the motives of its projectors we will assume they believed they would get by subscriptions from the public enough to carry it on. One of the Senators said a million shares at ten dollars apiece, making $10,000,000, would undoubtedly be subscribed. I did not at the time make any objection to it, it being bound and limited so far as human ingenuity could limit it, and I was willing to bid it Godspeed to the free and voluntary subscriptions of the American people.

So the whole affair was organized. A commission and a board of finance from the different States of the Union were appointed—to do what? Not that they might build up a lobby which should roar in the corridors of this House and beseech and importune members to vote against their convictions. No, sir; that was not the part of this board of commission or board of finance, but they were to give "character" to the enterprise among the people. They were to open books of subscription in the different States. It was provided, as I have said once before, that no State should subscribe more than its share in the first hundred days. The appeal was made to the country. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] was elected president of this commission to give it, deservedly, the benefit of his high character in the country for integrity and moderation.

I am bound to believe, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Connecticut at that time had no foreshadowing of the duty which was to be laid on his shoulders. I am bound to believe, knowing him as a fellow-member, and having admired his record before he came here, that when he accepted the presidency of this commission he did not know that he would be called upon to importune and argue with Congress to give millions against the pledges of the men who had first set the movement on foot. I give him the charity of believing this.

So they went to the country. What was the result, Mr. Chairman? Why, the whole thing, so far as gaining any appreciable amount outside of the little circle about Philadelphia, was a dead failure. Aside from the coterie of men interested in its organization, aside from the advertisements in the newspapers, aside from what sentiment could be worked up in Philadelphia and Pennsylvania, the whole thing fell flat, and there was no sentiment or feeling aroused in its behalf.

Mr. KELLEY. Permit me for a moment. I have handed to the reporters, and therefore have not by me, the list of subscriptions. I should be glad to hand to the reporters a list of subscriptions from the several States. It is as follows:

Number of shares subscribed to the stock of the centennial board of finance to April 28, 1874.

Pennsylvania	176,941
Arizona	102
Alabama	33
Arkansas	2
California	249
Connecticut	6
Delaware	63
District of Columbia	111
Florida	25
Georgia	100
Illinois	4
Indiana	31
Idaho	1
Iowa	1
Louisiana	120
Kansas	1
Maryland	47
Michigan	15
Missouri	16
Montana	2
Massachusetts	272
Nebraska	5
New Jersey, (including State subscription)	10,174
Nevada	84
New York	1,164
Oregon	540
Ohio	33
Rhode Island	11
Tennessee	1
Texas	5
Virginia	12
West Virginia	3
Wisconsin	62
England	50
Switzerland	2
Total shares	190,289

While I admit, Mr. Chairman, they are not what I hoped they might be, they will show there has been a subscription of 190,289 shares of stock from the citizens of the different States.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. How much in Pennsylvania?

Mr. KELLEY. Why, to the patriotism of Pennsylvania be it said, a very large percentage is there.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I thought so.

Mr. KELLEY. It shows that her people are determined if they can prevent it that the nation shall not be dishonored.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. We will come to that after awhile. Now, sir, I do not know of anything that will so smirch the national honor as for Congress to go back on its pledges. I know of nothing which is so fatal to a public man as to make pledges and promises which turn to ashes on his lips. So far, then, as there being any popular voice aroused for this public enterprise as shown by the meager amount of subscriptions outside the State of Pennsylvania, there is nothing before us.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there is anything which will urge a member to vote for this appropriation it must be, aside from the argument that we are committed in its behalf, that the people want it, that the people are interested in it, that it will develop agriculture and mechanical arts and sciences, that it will do all these things, and that the people see this and ask our help. And if there is a better way of testing all this than was tried in this case I have failed to see it. With the vast paraphernalia set up by Congress and ramifying to every district in the Union, with the best men in the States identified with its organization, with advertisements and puffs in all the papers in all the States, so far as contributions were concerned the country was as dry as Gideon's fleece. Now, does that prove that the people were interested in the centennial exhibition, or does it prove the contrary? What is the fact? These gentlemen went to the country and a verdict was returned against them. The experiment was tried, Mr. Chairman, in State Legislature after State Legislature. There are thirty-seven in all. I have looked ever the volume printed by Congress a few days ago on the subject with a good deal of care, and if I do not state numbers correctly it is because this book does not have them all here. But I cannot find in regard to State legislation that the patrons and managers of this enterprise were able to secure resolutions outside of Pennsylvania from any States except Tennessee and Virginia, and it may be New Jersey; I do not know how that is. Kentucky did not pass the resolutions that were presented. By New York and Massachusetts, largely interested, I may say, in the objects of this exhibition, the thing was voted down, and received its deathblow so far as those States go. Thirty-two States still remain, and I venture to say that in most of them there was an attempt to pass resolutions for appropriations or instructions to their delegations in Congress. Thirty-two States remain, and there is no living voice, no expression from them as State Legislatures, in favor of this enterprise.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I may state to the gentleman that, as a matter of fact, there was no attempt made in a great many of those States to my knowledge.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I am bound to take the gentleman's word for it. He undoubtedly believes that. But I, knowing how this thing has been pushed upon us early and late, in season and out of season, on this floor and elsewhere, have my belief that, notwithstanding the gentleman from Connecticut did not participate in this besieging of State Legislatures, still it was attempted in many States. I know it was attempted in many of them—not perhaps in all. At any rate, those thirty-two States remain, and there is no voice from them, although they are component parts of the great Union that is to be set up and glorified by this, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has just shown in his eloquent periods.

Why, sir, the whole appeal was a failure, and the managers, the boards of commissioners of finance, saw the whole grand structure that their imagination had raised fading away as swiftly as the vision of Mirza. The temples of their vision were not there. The offices, the presidencies, the secretaryships, the treasurerships, the boards of management and control, were all hopelessly fleeing away. They were, sir, a disappointed set of men. There have been disappointed mortals before in the history of the human race. What did they do? What, sir, would you naturally suppose that men would do, after running the gauntlet of congressional scrutiny and congressional promises; after being launched on the sea of popular favor and finding no help, what would you naturally suppose they would have done?

We have had North Pole expeditions, and they have failed. We have had patent after patent obtained by ingenious inventors which failed. We have had emigrant aid societies that have failed. And what has been the result? There has been an end to importunings and there has been peace. But these centennial gentlemen said, "No, there is another and a last resort; human memory is weak; human endurance yields; Congress is always open to us; no matter about the pledges; no matter about congressional action; no matter what the Senators and Representatives from Pennsylvania have said; no matter that the people who send Representatives to Congress have passed upon the subject and have given it no encouragement; still we will go to Congress; that is the inevitable resort unless the whole thing is to be allowed to fail."

What reasons were given for this assault upon the Treasury? The excuse has been given, and it will be heard here again before we get to the end of this discussion, that the panic came; that there was a contraction of business; that the people had no money, and that they could not raise the subscription they had expected. Did it never occur, sir, to these raiders on the United States Treasury that the panic and depression affected alike the Treasury of the Government and the individual? Nay, more; did it not occur to them that the public Treasury felt it first and in the most marked manner? Did they not know that the revenues fell off at once, that new currency was issued, that the payment of the national debt ceased, and that we began running behindhand? Did none of those considerations stay their importuning hand? Nothing, sir, whatever. They determined to invoke the interposition of Congress. More than that, they pushed to the front. It did not simply involve a new drain upon the Treasury, but it involved the strangling and death of meritorious measures on this floor. The centennial pushed, I say, to the front. Everything else had to give way. Nothing else could get an assignment but the centennial exhibition. Other measures were stifled in the committee of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and the committee of my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] because the condition of the public Treasury would not allow the draught. But the centennial exhibition, this that Mr. SHERMAN called the "Philadelphia show," had its place and its assignment. Why, sir, there are meritorious railroad propositions before this House that have in them intrinsic merit, and to-day they languish, they die, they have no breath of life even, because we are in an era of economy, but there is money for the centennial. The whole South is full of claims, some bad, some good; an impoverished, broken-down, repentant people are knocking at our doors every day for remuneration that shall set them up in life, and let them march again in the prosperous way of the Republic. But we have no money for them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman from Maine will be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time can be extended only by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. How much longer does the gentleman desire?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I will be as brief as may be.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There is no money for the war-ravaged South, and yet there is $3,000,000 for this exhibition. Why, sir, a few weeks ago the great river of the West broke from its banks and inundated a whole country; there were woe and desolation upon the face of the earth; houses were torn from their foundations and the inmates were borne away on the current to death, or to poverty and hunger; and there came up to the doors of Congress an appealing cry from those suffering, distressed, dying people, the occupants of hundreds of thousands of acres of our domain, and we gave them the bagatelle of $90,000 in rations, and closed our hearts and our pockets to any more appeals. But there is money in amplitude for the centennial exhibition, and a bill for its benefit must go through, while our southern brethren drown and starve by hundreds.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. He speaks about the South. Did the South ask for any more than $90,000?

Mr HALE, of Maine. Yes, indeed; of course they did. And I will say further to the gentleman that, pinched as we are, I will be glad myself to vote to give these suffering people, one hundred and forty thousand human souls, half a million dollars, or more, in any bill, with proper guards; for, although I am rather a strict constructionist, still I believe that where such woe and death are upon a component part of this great people, we ought to push away hard precedents and save our brothers and sisters.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. The South is very much obliged to the gentleman and to Congress for the $90,000, but that is all we asked for.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is the voice of a gentleman who is contented with $90,000 for the South, and wants $3,000,000 for the centennial.

It is claimed that we have gone too far, and have committed the Government in this matter. I propose to scrutinize that claim just exactly as I have scrutinized the record of the action of Congress, and see how it will stand the test of examination. It is said that we have given out invitations that bind us, that we have invited powers to come here, and that if we do nothing now we are dishonored. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has shadowed that forth, and we will hear more of it from the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] I judge from his report, and from others who will speak upon this matter. Let us look at it, and first as to the matter of invitation. I quote from good authority, the gentleman from Pennsylvania who last spoke. It may be remembered that on the 22d of January last that gentleman was pushing before the House a proposition that should direct invitations to be given. He got it through the House, but it failed in the Senate. I have before me the RECORD of January 22, in which I find that Mr. KELLEY said:

> Our own Government, not finding the word "invitation" in the law, have not extended a formal invitation, and have disclaimed the right to do so.

That was not three years ago; it was not two years ago; nay, it was not four months ago. It was at the close of January when the gentleman was pushing for what he knew, and I knew at the time, and trying to get in a voice of expostulation, but failing, would be regarded as a committal, and he was pushing it in order that he might be able to argue afterward that we had committed ourselves by an invitation. I ask the Clerk to read first from the proclamation of the President, given under the law passed by Congress, what I have marked in ink, and let us see whether that involves us.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The President indulges the hope that the government of —— will be pleased to notice the subject, and may deem it proper to bring the exhibition and its objects to the attention of the people of that country, and thus encourage their co-operation in the proposed celebration. And he further hopes that the opportunity afforded by the exhibition for the interchange of national sentiment and friendly intercourse between the people of both nations may result in new and still greater advantages to science and industry, and at the same time serve to strengthen the bonds of peace and friendship which already happily subsist between the government and the people of —— and those of the United States.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. What was the proclamation of the President? Why made? As a gentleman on my left suggests, in the line of the argument urged when the bill was before the Senate, it was made in order to give character to this exhibition; that was all; information that this enterprise was set up, and that there would be this exhibition. But it did not stop there.

After the invitation, as it is called, the proclamation, as it really is and nothing more, had been sent out to our ministers, the Secretary of State found that some of them were inclined to construe it as an invitation. Let us see what he did in the way of committing us, so that we cannot go back and save our honor. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked in the circular of the Secretary of State.

The Clerk read as follows:

> It will be observed that the President in his proclamation has extended no "invitation" to foreign powers to participate in the exhibition. He was not authorized so to do, and while he desires to attract as much attention and interest as possible thereto, he carefully confines himself to "commending" the celebration of the centennial anniversary of American independence, and the exhibition which is to be held in connection therewith, to all nations who may be pleased to take part therein. It is presumed that you will not have failed to observe the guarded language of the President's proclamation, and the difference between it and that which would be used in extending an invitation to other powers.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is the very last act of the executive department of the Government. That circular is dated November 3, 1873, six months ago. That is the very last act of the executive branch of the Government bearing upon this exposition. Instead of committing us as gentlemen have argued, instead of an invitation and a committal, it is a direct repudiation of any such thing. It declares that there is no invitation, that it does not mean that it shall be taken as an invitation. It declares that the law does not justify an invitation.

Now I ask the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] I ask any gentleman who is prepared to speak on this subject in favor of this appropriation, to point out when and where the executive department is committed in this matter in the way of invitation of foreign powers. I put the question to all within the sound of my voice, and I ask as a favor that when they come to argue in support of this centennial exhibition they shall state to the House when and where the United States have committed themselves by its executive branch to this exhibition. It is their duty to do this. They have made that argument early and late, everywhere, constantly. Now I ask them to back it up and let us see where it is. Sir, it cannot be found; it does not exist. The whole fact is that the executive department ran in the line pointed out by the law, and thanks to the moderation of the President and the Secretary of State, and to their good judgment, it did decline to involve us.

Gentlemen say that the President's message to the House is in that direction. That message is entitled to great respect, but it is simply a recommendation. It does not bind Congress, it does not bind the nation. It is a recommendation like any other, and should be given careful attention; it is not in any way a committal.

While this first proclamation of the President was sent out, let us see what return was made to it. We have seen how the country here answered. I want to know how the world answers. I want to know if all the great powers representing modern civilization are committed to come here, and I want to know whether they seized this opportunity to declare that they would come cordially as friends, and whether we are confronted with the fact that we have invited guests and are now going to shut our doors on them.

I take the congressional volume again. If I do not give all the powers accepting, it is the fault of the report. The gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] who is here, can correct any mistake I may make, or any mistake I am laboring under from the book. I find a reply in very guarded language from the German Empire signed Bismarck; a reply taking up in this book seven or eight printed lines, calling for some rules under which it is proposed to act, and signed by Bismarck as the chancellor of the empire. That is one of the great powers in Europe. Below that I find a communication from the Netherlands minister in Washington, Mr. Westenberg, in very nearly the same terms, a short, curt communication, indicating that a commission will be appointed, and a committee to direct and furnish information to exhibitors.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Read it; read it.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. As the reading has been called for, I will ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

I have the honor to inform your excellency that the government of the Netherlands has received this international invitation with lively satisfaction, and intends to take part in the said exposition by contributing productions of the arts and industry of the Netherlands.

To this effect a commission will be appointed in the Netherlands, and also a committee to direct and furnish information to exhibitors.

As soon as it shall be in my power, I shall hasten to communicate to your excellency the names and quality of the persons who are to constitute this committee.

WESTENBERG.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Now, Mr. Chairman, there are these two notes from two powers—one great power and one small power. Aside from these, I do not find any acceptance of what is called the invitation from any other power whatever; but I do find the statement that Belgium, Sweden, Norway, Switzerland, Mexico, Ecuador, Hayti, and the Sandwich Islands have also accepted—all of them small powers. Where are the great powers? Where is the acceptance from the British Empire, kindred to us in blood and tongue, a nation which must certainly figure largely in any international exposition in which the world outside of ourselves figures? Where is the acceptance by France, and Russia, and Italy, and Spain, nations which should contribute to an international exhibition if any people should? There is no voice from them. The acceptance, if you call it such, is narrowed down to Germany and six or eight small powers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, does this commit us? Are we bound by anything here? Is there anything in the argument that we have gone too far to recede? Is there anything in this that forbids Congress saying, so far as it may say, "Stop!" Where is the evidence that a single appliance of human ingenuity has been set in motion in any quarter of the globe looking to this exposition? Supposing to-day that the international feature should be stripped from it, where is the evidence that abroad there would be any disappointment? And yet it is said that we are bound.

I am curious and should be glad to learn when it was in the mind of gentlemen who had this matter in charge that it first occurred to claim that Congress was bound. We have seen that down as late as June, 1872, Congress declared that it was bound in the other direction. The gentleman from Connecticut, I may say again, did not then believe that Congress was bound. When did the idea first take root in his mind or in the mind of any gentleman that Congress was bound to make appropriations of money for this exposition? I have as fairly and candidly as in me lies endeavored to trace the record itself. We have seen what Congress did. I have shown all that the executive department has done; I have shown it up abroad; and to-day I ask again where on the broad surface of the globe is there any indication that the world looks upon us as committed to this exposition as a people and as a government? This is another thing which I hope gentlemen who are to speak on this matter will show the House.

Only a few words more, Mr. Chairman. When we start upon this matter we do well to consider where we shall end. Let no gentleman be deceived in this regard. When we adopt this appropriation of $3,000,000, it means that we as a Congress shall pay the bills. Why, sir, if you cannot shut off an appropriation of $3,000,000 by repeated declarations of Congress that you will not pay one dollar, how shall you be able to strangle an appropriation of five, or six, or eight million dollars more when the unpaid bills come in? I say again, let no gentleman be deceived. We shall have to pay the entire bill aside from what the receipts may be (and they must be meager in comparison with the figures that are presented), and aside from the contribution by the State of Pennsylvania, with small contributions (not aggregating, perhaps, half a million dollars) in other communities. And, by the way, how does Pennsylvania appropriate in this matter? She has given a million and a half of dollars by appropriations, as I understand; but it is provided—what? That this shall be for a building to be erected as a permanent structure for the benefit of the State of Pennsylvania in years to come. This is not an appropriation for a national exposition, and it ought not to be claimed as such. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in his figures charges the centennial exhibition with half a million dollars for the use of that building on the ground that it would take half a million dollars to build a temporary building for the exhibition. Aside from this and from the receipts, we, I say, have got to pay the bills. They will surely come in. Congress will already have appropriated $3,000,000. In the homely phrase of the country, the bars will have been "let down;" and when more money is called for to pay liabilities contracted by this corporation which is set up by the Government, how will you meet the demand? Do gentlemen know what form this is likely to take when the enterprise is all over and the arrearages are footed up? Why, it will be said that this is the debt of a corporation sanctioned by Congress—a corporation whose liabilities Congress had assumed to the extent of $3,000,000; and that therefore we should pay the balance. I put myself here as willing in this matter to prophesy what will be before us in the next three years. Is there any gentleman here who dares to promise the contrary? Is there any gentleman here who will dare to promise that only $3,000,000 will be called for? Will the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] dare to make that promise and maintain it hereafter? Does he not know that the last thing "the gentleman in politics" can afford is to have his word and his promise broken? Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] dare to make the promise? When this money shall have been spent, and when his State shall have refused to appropriate more, how will he save himself from being ground between the upper and the nether millstone? Will other gentlemen here who are prepared to vote for this appropriation and then argue here and before the country that only $3,000,000 will be asked—will they dare to promise it in the light of the action of the managers of this enterprise who are now pushing it against repeated pledges?

Let us look at some results of action here. The moment you pass this appropriation every dollar of subscription in the broad land will cease. Do gentlemen believe that there is any State in the Union which through its citizens will contribute money to this enterprise after it is known that Congress has saddled the Treasury with an appropriation of $3,000,000? The moment that is known all other subscription will cease.

The expenses, sir, will be large—they will be immense as compared with the figures which have been set down. I have looked at the figures of the Vienna exposition. I find there it has cost, not counting the income—and I take my figures from the congressional report—$9,850,000 on the part of the government of Austria. They deduct from that an income of $2,000,000. One word as to this income. If the Vienna exposition, in the middle of all Europe, representing a population of two hundred and fifty million people, only got by receipts $2,000,000, how much do gentlemen believe an exposition in Philadelphia, in the middle of the United States, with a population of forty millions, would give? Not more, I should say, than $1,000,000.

In addition to that we are told foreign powers gave to the Vienna exposition—it is estimated in this book at $5,000,000. Does anybody believe foreign powers will give $5,000,000 or even $1,000,000 toward this exposition in the city of Philadelphia? If they do not, then what is the result? The exposition building in Philadelphia is to be built large enough for the world. It is to be a building large enough to embrace the productions of Russia, Prussia, England, France, Turkey—of all the nations, and of all the isles of the sea. There has to be room for them all; and if they do not contribute to fill up the space allotted to them what will be the result? The last thing the managers of this exhibition will bear will be emptiness. There will be hundreds of thousands of dollars expended so that the visitor when he is here will not be jarred in his feelings by beholding acre on acre of unoccupied ground and untenanted rooms. So that this $5,000,000 which will not be given by foreign powers to fill the room allotted to them will to a great degree be taken out of the Treasury, and the centennial commission will run into debt, if not to that amount of $5,000,000, at least to two or three millions, which will have to be added to the $9,850,000 which it cost the government of Austria for the Vienna exposition.

We are told that the private exhibitors paid $5,000,000 too. Does anybody believe that they will pay as much here? Giving the benefit of all that Pennsylvania will do, of all the private subscriptions of all the States and of all that will come from abroad, and I venture to say that $10,000,000 will not make up the balance; and I believe just as firmly as I stand here that in the next three years we will be called upon to pay from six to ten million dollars in order to liquidate the bills on account of this exposition. I am proceeding on the belief that the managers will strive for an exhibition on nearly as large a scale as that at Vienna, and the argument will be almost irresistible when the whole thing has failed—when the doors will be shut of that great temple of industry as it is projected and when it is found that this corporation which we have chartered and to which we have given $3,000,000 is still in debt six, seven, or eight million dollars—I say the argument will be almost irresistible that we, as a nation, must pay the bill, so that at last, worn out and tired as Merlin was with the importunities of Vivien, we will yield and give our money in order that there may be peace. The bonds will be about us and there will be nothing for us to do, weary and worn, but to pay and thank the Lord at last that there is an end to all this.

I believe this is coming upon us, and in saying this I give the gentlemen in charge of the enterprise credit for integrity, credit for patriotism, and all that, but they are in charge of the management of a thing which neither they nor we can control. Setting aside all the other questions which I hope other gentlemen will touch upon, setting aside all the disappointments which will come upon us when we have tried the experiment and found it a partial failure, looking at the matter in every point of view as I have endeavored to do as fairly as possible, the conclusion which I have stated is inevitable, and I beg gentlemen to consider the force of all the arguments upon the one side and the weakness upon the other, and to reflect seriously before we launch out upon this appropriation.

Mr. PACKARD. I regret very much that I am compelled to differ from my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] so totally as I must on this occasion. I am wholly in favor of this centennial celebration. It commends itself to my judgment. It commends itself to me as being in the interests of the country. It commends itself to my feelings of patriotism. I believe in it thoroughly and entirely. And not only am I in favor of this centennial exposition, but the next one also; and I will go so far as to say that I am in favor of celebrating the one thousandth anniversary of this country's birthday. If we do not make an appropriation when that time comes for celebrating the one thousandth anniversary of this country, I shall think that republics are not destined to live long, and this one especially; that their lives are short, and ought to be short.

Before I proceed to say what I had intended to say on this bill, I must notice some of the statements made by my distinguished friend from Maine. I listened to his argument with a pleasure not amounting to conviction. I doubt whether there is any gentleman within the sound of my voice who could make a more cogent, a more forcible, and withal a more eloquent argument in opposition to this bill than that gentleman has made here and now. But, sir, it does not convince my judgment.

The gentleman from Maine tells us in the first place that one of the reasons, one of the strong reasons, on account of which he opposes this bill is the condition of the country. I know, and I agree with him, that the condition of the country is not what we desire it to be. It is not perhaps as prosperous financially as it was a year ago; but I think, sir, he exaggerates the ill condition of the country somewhat. It is not correct to say that the payments of the public debt have wholly ceased. Since December last each successive monthly report of the Secretary of the Treasury has shown large payments on the public debt. The payments have not ceased. Neither will this appropriation cause them to cease. Because the country is not in the financial condition in which it ought to be furnishes no sound reason why we should refuse to celebrate in a fitting manner our centennial anniversary, a date which we cannot change, and which we must celebrate in 1876 or not at all.

A wise business man when depression comes does not cease to advertise. He believes he must then give greater publicity to his business, and thus widen the circle of his traffic, and thus shall his business increase in spite of the depression of the times. No, sir; the condition of the country is not such but that it may well make this appropriation, and thus make of our adversity a stepping-stone to a prosperity unknown before. The exposition will open to us the world's markets for many of our products that have heretofore remained at home.

But the objection to the bill on which the gentleman dwells most, that objection which he fortifies by all the arguments he can bring to its support, that objection which he dwelt upon during almost the whole of his speech, is that the Congress of the United States has said that it would not make an appropriation for this purpose, and he desires to know whether this Congress will "go back upon its pledges." Why, sir, we are placed in a peculiar position in regard to this matter. We are obliged to do one thing or the other. We are obliged to go forward or backward; and in either case we cannot stand exactly by our former legislation. Let us look at it. In the first place Congress passed an act on the 3d of March, 1871, to which allusion has already been made. We find that the very title of that act conveys to foreign nations the idea that we shall invite them to participate. What is the title of the act? "An act relative to the centennial international exhibition." The very title of the bill tells foreign nations that we are going to have in this country an "international" exhibition. Nor is that all. In June, 1872, another bill was passed, and we find in that bill also that it is equally an "international" exhibition. It is made national and "international" by these bills. It is international in spite of this Congress. The objection has been made that it ought not to be an international exhibition, and it has been said, "Let us have a great national exhibition, and leave out the international part of it." We cannot do it. We have made it international already by our laws.

Now, then, we have held out to foreign nations the idea that this is to be an "international" exhibition. And what does the President do? He commends to foreign nations—and the gentleman himself has had the proclamation read—he commends to foreign nations this exposition of the industries—of what? of the industries of the United States? O, no! Of the industries "of all nations." He commends the exposition of the industries of all nations—not to the States of this Union, but to all those nations abroad who may be inclined to participate in it. What do they suppose from that? They construe it as an invitation. They cannot do anything else than construe it thus. It is to them an invitation which conveys to them the action of this Government. It conveys to them the idea that they may come here to participate, and they will be welcome. The President goes just as far as he can go under the law, and he does convey to them what they construe as an invitation. Now, it seems to me that when we say that that is not an invitation we are only quibbling upon words. I do not believe that a great nation like this should quibble with other nations as to the terms of an invitation.

We stand here one of the foremost among the nations of the earth. Some of the leading nations of Europe have accepted, and accepted in good faith, this invitation. They have already secured room in the exhibition building; they have made their arrangements; they have adopted our suggestion and proffered their assistance. They have been faster than we have; they have come forward nobly. Nearly a score of nations have given us to understand that they are coming here to participate in this great exhibition, and now shall we say to them after all this, "stay at home; we do not want you here?"

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we are not going to have this exhibition; if we are going to cause this thing to cease; if the exhibition is not to have a being and a name at Philadelphia, then we must explain to these nations why it is. Who shall explain it and how will it be explained? I do not envy the gentleman from Maine the task of explaining to foreign nations that we do not want them here; that there is no room for them here; that we shut our doors in their faces and tell them to stay at home. How will he explain it? Will he say that the people of this country have no inclination for such an exhibition? If he does, he will certainly misrepresent the sentiment of the people. Will he say that we are too poor; that we are not able to bear the expense of this exhibition; that we are not able to bear the expenditure of the $3,000,000 now asked to be appropriated for that purpose? Who would believe him? No one, I humbly trust. It will be a sad day for us when it is believed at home or abroad that an expenditure of seven and a half cents per capita will bankrupt the nation.

To treat the nations thus is "going back" upon our past action. The gentleman says it will "smirch our national honor" if we do not stand by our previous legislation, which provided that Congress shall not be liable for the expenses of this exhibition. But, sir, the act of Congress and the action of the President have been construed by foreign nations as an invitation to them. We must therefore violate either the one pledge or the other. We have told them that there should be in this country an international exposition of the industries of all nations; we have said also in the same bill that Congress shall not be liable for the expenses of the exposition.

We must either disregard that declaration in our legislation or else we must fly in the faces of these nations from abroad, and I ask Congress which they will do? In the one case it affects only ourselves; it affects no man's honor. There is scarcely a Congress that does not undo some legislation of a preceding Congress. The next Congress will probably undo some of our work. Did not this Congress early in the session undo what was recognized by the people and by this Congress as a mistake on the part of the last Congress? It is frequently done; it is no uncommon thing for one Congress to undo the work of a preceding Congress; there is no national dishonor in it. But if, after having promised foreign nations an international exposition of the industries, not of our own nation but of all nations, and after they have made their preparations for it, we then shut our doors in their faces and tell them to stay at home, that we do not want them, it would be national dishonor. We must do one or the other of these things.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine desires to know when this Congress became bound to assist this exhibition. It was bound the very day it passed the first enactment providing for an international exposition. I will say for myself that from the very day when the measure became a law I felt that Congress would be bound in a certain sense to carry out this work, and I said to some of my friends that Congress would yet have to pay a portion of the expenses, and that when the time came I should be willing for one to come forward and assist, so far as lay in my power, in providing for those expenses.

We are told by the gentleman, again, that the subscriptions to the stock of the centennial have failed because the people do not take any interest in it. Sir, the people of the country look to Congress to provide for this work. They knew that if a mistake was made in putting into the bill the provision that Congress should not be liable for the expenses, Congress would repeal that provision. The first promoters of the enterprise supposed that the enthusiasm which had touched them would extend all over the country, and there would be no necessity for an appeal to Congress. But when there came a general depression in business the centennial commission found it absolutely necessary to look to Congress for a portion of the expenses.

The gentleman tells us further that but few of the States have done anything in this matter, that few of the States have shown by the action of their Legislatures that they desire that this exhibition should take place. He must know that many of the State Legislatures did not assemble this last winter. This was the case in my own State of Indiana. There was no session of her Legislature last winter, that body meeting only biennially. I do not know what the Legislature would have done had it been in session. But I do know this, that when the State board of agriculture of Indiana met in Indianapolis on the 12th of February last they passed this resolution among others:

Resolved, That we do most heartily commend this international exhibition to the Congress of the United States.

My State is largely an agricultural State. The State board of agriculture, holding a meeting in the city of Indianapolis, which was largely attended by the citizens of Indianapolis, not confined to the State board, addressed by the governor in a speech commendatory of the exhibition, proceeded to declare this:

Resolved, That we do most earnestly commend this international exhibition to the Congress of the United States, to the Representatives of this State, and to all of the citizens of Indiana, believing the occasion worthy the best thought and labor of each individual citizen and the combined wisdom of the industrial and other organizations of the State.

These are the words which the State board sent forth to the people of the State of Indiana, a board representing the leading interest of the State. Let me speak for a moment of the resources of Indiana. Let me say that one of the principal reasons why I am in favor of this bill is that I fully believe, as I stand here to-day, that this exposition, if held as contemplated, will bring back to Indiana alone the $3,000,000 proposed to be appropriated by this bill. I believe Indiana will be benefited to the full amount of the $3,000,000 which I trust will be appropriated by Congress.

We do not often hear her praises sounded on this floor. But how does she stand in the sisterhood of States? In 1876 Indiana will have been a State of the Union just sixty years. And if the ratio of increase of her population for the last five years holds good until then—and it is increasing—she will then have a population of two millions, or two-thirds as much as the entire population of the Republic in 1776.

Nor is that all. Indiana occupies a central position in this confederacy. She occupies such a position that she has transportation facilities not surpassed by those of any other State. She will have in 1876 of good farming lands eleven million three hundred thousand acres and eight million acres of woodland, together worth in cash $700,000,000. In improved agricultural implements she will have then invested $21,000,000. The annual value of her products will be $150,000,000. She has her canals and rivers, the great lakes touching her on the north, and the grandest system of railways in the world. I do not hesitate to challenge comparison in that respect with any State in this Union, or with any country on earth. Radiating from her capital they reach nearly every county in the State. Her water-ways extend on the one hand to the Gulf of Mexico, and on the other by way of the great lakes to the Atlantic. The county in which I live sends its waters to the Atlantic and to the Gulf.

There are not less than eight of the large through lines of railroad from the Atlantic to the Mississippi that pass across the limits of the State. With all these advantages, in the midst of these wonderful means of transportation, lie beds of iron ore and fields of coal of vast extent that will ere long place her in the front ranks of the manufacturing States of the Union. Still further, in 1876 Indiana will have ten thousand school-houses within her borders and a school fund of $9,000,000, greater I undertake to say than that of any other State of the Union.

And why should she not desire to advertise herself to the world? She cannot afford not to do it. With such an opportunity offered to exhibit these wonderful results, she cannot afford to let this exhibition be a failure. She cannot afford to take no part in it. She cannot afford to let it be anything less than a national and an international industrial exhibition. She has no desire to stand looking in a mirror and contemplating her own loveliness. She wishes to let the world know what she is and what she has, so that she may move forward in her moral, intellectual, and material advancement with mightier strides than ever before. So much for Indiana and the part she is destined to take in this exhibition.

I proceed now to notice whether other States of this Union have shown an interest in behalf of this exhibition. In looking over this book to which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] frequently referred, I find that the State of Tennessee through her Legislature spoke in this language:

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That our Senators be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to propose, advocate, and sustain by their votes such an appropriation by Congress for said centennial exhibition as may be necessary to make said proposed celebration thoroughly national and international, and worthy alike of the Government and people of the United States; provided that said appropriation shall not be given in aid of any corporation for that purpose.

And this is what the State of Kentucky has said:

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are hereby requested to consider favorably all measures of national legislation necessary to make the exhibition worthy of the occasion and a credit to the American people.

And I find that the State of North Carolina resolved—

That the people of North Carolina be earnestly recommended to heartily co-operate with the officers of said exhibition, in order to carry out its design to the fullest measure of success, in order to bring before capitalists and men of culture fair specimens of the natural and artificial products of the nation.

That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to promote all measures requisite for making said international exhibition a truthful exponent of the progress of the nation.

Virginia has resolved through her Legislature to the same effect; and I have no doubt that when the State Legislatures meet next winter many more of them will take the same position.

Another thought occurs to me in connection with this action from Southern State Legislatures—and it is to me a very forcible reason why we should proceed with this exposition, and why the people of the whole nation through their Representatives in Congress here to-day should make this appropriation. Why, sir, broken and shattered as the South has been by the late war within her borders, you will find her coming up almost as one man in support of this exposition. She has already shown it; and it is to me a significant indication that we prefer peace to unpleasantness, that we prefer fraternal feeling to bitterness and hostility. Let them come, let them join with the great people of the North in the grand march of empire. Let them come with their products to the international exposition at Philadelphia, and become acquainted with our people during the six months of that exhibition; and when they return to their homes, they and we will "know each other better," and I trust in God will "love each other better."

Why, sir, it has been sometimes sneeringly said that this is "Philadelphia's Fourth of July celebration." It has been said (I have not heard the remark here to-day, and I am glad of it) that this enterprise smacks too much of Fourth of July sentimentalism. Sir, let it smack of Fourth of July sentimentalism. I believe in sentiment. I believe to-day that the Fourth of July is worth more to us than gold—worth more than iron or cotton, or mines of silver and gold. Why, sir, if the soldiers of the great North during the "late unpleasantness" in the South had one advantage more than another, it was that we had on our side "Yankee Doodle," and "Hail Columbia," and the "Fourth of July." I remember very well that just as hostilities terminated a citizen of Raleigh, North Carolina, who had seen much service in the confederate army, was describing to me his feelings when Sherman's magnificent army was marching in review past the capital of that State. Said he, "I sat there watching your soldiers pass. There was the old 'flag of the Union' floating over them, the old 'Stars and Stripes' which I had abandoned floated over me; and just as they came opposite to where I sat the band struck up 'Yankee Doodle.' Then," said he, "my hat came off my head, and I was just about to swing it and hollow 'three cheers for the Union,' when I thought 'why, what am I doing? I am a confederate and a rebel.' Then I seated myself again humbly and let the procession pass on."

Why, sir, there is nothing like the sentiment of patriotism to stir the hearts of men. I am glad that we had and have to-day a "sentiment" about this matter. Gentlemen may accuse me, if they choose, of talking sentiment. I believe in it. Why, sir, there is nothing like historical associations. Blot out the virtues, the struggles, and the toils of the men who achieved our independence; efface the memory of Washington and his grand deeds; forget Franklin, and Adams, and Jefferson, and Hancock, and Jay, and Otis, and Henry, and you thrust from you the most enduring bond of Union. Historical association is worth more than gold. We ought not to trample it under our feet; we ought not to spurn it; we ought not to sneer or to laugh at it. It is what holds us together as a nation.

The iconoclasts broke the images which they believed turned religion into idolatry; but if they had believed they were symbols of their holy religion, they would have enshrined them in the sacred repository of their hearts and homes. So we should cherish the tender memories of the past—images which stimulate our patriotism and give fervor to our love of country.

To this day the Protestants of Londonderry celebrate the anniversary of the closing of their gates and the raising of the siege; and the historian tells us that the old wall which still stands is "to the Protestants of Ulster what the trophy of Marathon was to the Athenians." Tokens of the memorable siege stand thick on every hand, and are all preserved with a care amounting to veneration. Let no one fail to respect the sentiment thus exhibited. It marks the better part of human nature; it shows a higher and purer humanity; it makes stronger the nation that feels it.

And Macaulay adds, in words applicable here, and not to be forgotten: "A people who take no pride in the achievements of remote ancestors will never achieve anything worthy to be remembered by remote descendants."

We are sometimes told that this centennial exposition of ours will be to Great Britain an unpleasant reminder of that heroic struggle in which we cut loose from the mother-country. By no means. Great Britain will be proud as she is to-day of this strong child of hers—not her first-born, nor yet perhaps her youngest-born, but the stoutest, the strongest, and the grandest of her offspring. She will be proud of this child of hers, which was born of her own "fierce spirit of liberty."

We have been told in certain quarters, not here—I allude to no member of this House—we are told sometimes that we shall have nothing to show. I would not belittle the country in that way. We shall have much to show. We shall teach foreign nations as they will teach us. Thus there will be mutual profit, mutual benefit in this exposition. It has gone abroad sometimes that this nation is corrupt. Corruption may exist. I will not say that we are free from it; but it has been grossly exaggerated as everybody knows. We invite foreign nations to come here; and we propose to show them that we are better, far better than they have been taught to believe of us. We can do this, if we once get their presence here, as we shall in this exposition.

I was surprised to see not long since from the pen of a distinguished gentleman now resident in France who has represented this country at a foreign court that he is opposed to the idea of having "the flag of the United States on any occasion, and especially on an occasion so purely national as this, trailed behind the flag of any minor or municipal corporation." Who desires this? Not Philadelphia. We have been told this is a Philadelphia exhibition. If it is, whose fault is it? Philadelphia has taken hold of this work in earnest, and sometimes there are thrown out reproaches against her because of the deep interest she has shown in the enterprise. Because she has done so much she is now asked to do all. If Philadelphia had stood aloof, all recognizing that as the proper place for this exhibition—if she had stood aloof, then we might with justice condemn her. But, unlike the wagoner who called upon Hercules, she has put her own shoulder to the wheel from the first. If it is really to be Philadelphia's Fourth of July celebration, it will be through no fault of hers, but because we do not step forward as we ought and elevate it from a city show to be the nation's grand opportunity. Those who oppose this appropriation are they who would degrade the exposition to a municipal show, with "the flag of the Union trailed behind the flag of the corporation." They would force upon it the character of a State or city celebration, and then condemn it for being what they would make it. Having stripped it of all nationality we are to insist that it is a Philadelphia exhibition and refuse the necessary assistance.

I wish to notice the pecuniary compensation we are likely to receive from holding the exposition. I do not know how many people will come from foreign lands to this exhibition. I know thousands of Americans every year go to Europe and spend money there. It is largely under the figures to say that three thousand Americans go to Europe annually, and that they spend $1,000 each during their visit; but if this were all, they spend as much as the appropriation which is asked for this national exposition. They take out of this country that much money and leave it with foreigners. Let us reverse the tide of travel, and what will be the result if we keep our own people at home one year and bring foreigners here? Suppose three thousand foreigners come and spend $1,000 each, you will have as the result $3,000,000 brought from abroad which will give back to us the appropriation which is now asked.

And who doubts that during the exposition many more than three thousand visitors will come from abroad. I do not know but the number will be fifty or a hundred thousand. They will visit us and traverse our whole country. Thousands of them will make their way to California. In the summer of 1876 thousands will visit the Yosemite Valley, and will spend money on their way. They will scatter abroad throughout the country, spending money wherever they go. We want "more money," and thus we shall have it; our limited circulation will be largely increased. We shall be repaid over and over again by keeping at home the money that would otherwise be spent abroad, and by inducing the people of other nations to bring us more.

But, sir, I look for far better results than those which are involved in any money consideration. What is a nation for? To guarantee our freedom? But our freedom is worth possessing only as it develops intellectual and moral, social and industrial, vigor. The savage is free; and what is his freedom worth? He remains for ages in the same state of hopeless ignorance. Progress—the growth of power and influence, the quickening of all human energies, the development of material resources—these are the ends of liberty. This exposition of the industries of all nations will stir intellectual, inventive, and industrial activities, that will girdle the earth with their beneficent influences and open the gospel of liberty to nations that have not yet read its pages. It will open up mines of golden thought as well as of golden ores. It will exhibit to ourselves of ourselves much we never knew or saw before. The man from the far South may come into that exposition and witness processes of mechanical and scientific industry he never heard of before, and he will bring there processes of industry developed and carried on for years and years in the South we never heard of before. Thus we will mutually aid, assist, and educate each other to prepare ourselves for greater advancement and greater progress, morally, intellectually, and materially than we have ever known before.

Then I say, Mr. Chairman, plant this seed in this good ground, and the birds of the air will not devour it up; the sun will not scorch it till it withers away; thorns will not grow up to choke it, but it will spring up and bear fruit a hundred-fold.

Mr. TREMAIN rose.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to give notice that at the conclusion of the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] I propose to move that the committee rise, and that the House take a recess for the evening session which has already been agreed upon. I hope gentlemen will give us a full quorum to do business.

Mr. KELLEY. What is the business assigned for this evening?

Mr. GARFIELD. The Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. KELLEY. Does not this bill now under discussion come up?

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to renew my notice that no business shall be done to-night without a quorum.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Chairman, in presenting very briefly the reasons for the vote which I intend to give upon this bill, I freely concede that my mind has been moved by opposite and conflicting sentiments. On the one hand, my determined rule of action leads me to promote, in every proper mode, economy and retrenchment in public expenditures, and to protect to the extent of my feeble ability the public Treasury. On the other hand, my resolution is equally inflexible to maintain, at any cost, and under all circumstances, the true dignity, honor, and good name of the United States, compared with which mere pecuniary considerations sink into insignificance.

The question whether we shall now authorize the appropriation which is deemed necessary to give success to the centennial international exhibition for 1876 comes to us in an aspect quite different from what it would present if we were deciding as an original question the proposition whether it should receive the aid and support of the Federal Government. It would be a pertinent and truthful argument in such case in favor of such a proposition to urge that it was very doubtful whether an undertaking of such magnitude could be carried forward by the voluntary subscriptions of the people, inasmuch as they would truthfully allege that it was a national matter and ought to be aided by the national Government. It would also be proper then to remind Congress that this nation had been invited to attend the three great international exhibitions of the world, and had not only accepted these invitations, but had given assurance that in due time these courtesies would be returned by an exhibition on this side of the Atlantic. It would also have been in order to suggest that the English, French, and Austrian exhibitions had been supported mainly by the aid of government, and that without such assistance they would probably have never been held.

Congress has already decided that this exhibition should be national and should be under the patronage of Congress. The act of March 3, 1871, creating the commission, declares in the preamble that "the exhibition should be a national celebration in which the people of the whole country should participate, and should have the sanction of Congress." The subsequent act of June 1, 1872, created a corporation called the centennial board of finance, with corporators in every State and Territory having authority to procure subscriptions to a capital stock of $10,000,000 to be used to carry out the objects of the exhibition.

And I may say here that the first act provided that there should be commissioners appointed, and alternate commissioners, in every State and Territory of the Union on the nomination of the governor of the State or Territory, with the sanction and approval of the President of the United States. Ninety-four gentlemen have been appointed with the presidential sanction, and have proceeded in accordance with the direction of these acts of Congress to discharge the high and important functions that were intrusted to their care.

I submit, sir, beyond all controversy, that by these acts the governmental sanction was bestowed upon the enterprise. Acting in accordance with these laws, the grounds that had been selected for the site in Fairmount Park were dedicated with the presidential approval, and the presidential proclamation was issued commending the enterprise to the favor of the people. Then followed the circular transmitted by the Secretary of State to foreign ministers and to the ministers of the United States abroad, inclosing copies of the regulations prescribed by the commissioners of the exhibition, which extended a cordial invitation to the nations to be represented at the exhibition, and requesting a formal acceptance of the invitation.

That there may be no misunderstanding as to the manner in which our Government sent out these invitations, and that there may be no confusion arising from the fact that our Secretary of State did afterward sent out to our ministers—not to foreign ministers, I rejoice to say—but that he did afterward, when the fear of the failure of this exposition was staring us in the face, when we desired to retreat as far as we consistently could from the difficulties of the situation, he then wrote to our ministers abroad words of caution as contained in the communication to our ministers abroad which was read by the gentleman from Maine. But what had been done before? Let there be no misunderstanding of this subject. The last section of the original act provided that—

> Whenever the President shall be informed by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings for the purpose, and for the exclusive control by the commission herein provided for of the proposed exhibition, the President shall, through the Department of State, make proclamation of the same, setting forth the time at which the exhibition will open and the place at which it will be held; and he shall communicate to the diplomatic representatives of all nations copies of the same, together with such regulations as may be adopted by the commissioners, for publication in their respective countries.

What were the regulations that the Secretary of State sent out and to which he directed attention in the official communication of the Government of the United States? The third, fourth, and fifth regulations were as follows:

> Third. A cordial invitation is hereby extended to every nation of the earth to be represented by its arts, industries, progress, and development.
> Fourth. A formal acceptance of this invitation is requested previous to March 4, 1874.
> Fifth. Each nation accepting this invitation is requested to appoint a commission, through which all matters pertaining to its own interest shall be conducted, &c.

Now what was said in the very note sent out by Secretary Fish in the name of the President? One paragraph of it was read by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] Another paragraph, which that gentleman did not read, calls attention to the invitation officially in these words:

> In the law providing for the holding of the exhibition, Congress directed that copies of the proclamation of the President, setting forth the time of its opening and the place at which it was to be held, together with such regulations as might be adopted by the commissioners of the exhibition, should be communicated to the diplomatic representatives of all nations. Copies of those regulations are herewith transmitted.

Then follows the expression of a hope by the President that the nations will attend and bring their objects of industry and of art to this gathering.

How were these invitations understood by governments abroad? They were understood precisely as every man of common sense would understand them, as invitations under the act of Congress, with the proclamation of the President sanctioning the opening of the enterprise and with the chief official organ of communication of the Government of the United States sending out these cordial letters of invitation, calling attention to these rules and regulations. How were they understood abroad?

These invitations are justly regarded by the governments to which they were sent as governmental invitations, and as such they have been accepted by the following nations, namely: Germany, Belgium, Netherlands, Switzerland, Ecuador, Chili, Argentine Confederation, Brazil, Hayti, Liberia, Hawaii, Mexico, and Sweden. Communications have been received indicating their purpose to be represented from France, England, Scotland, Wales, Italy, Spain, Turkey, Austria, Russia, Egypt, China, Japan, Australia, New Zealand, and Canada.

How were they understood in the German Empire? That country which, when John Bull stood back and said, "Do not invest one dollar in the securities of the United States," at a time when we were engaged in a struggle for life, came forward and generously invested in American bonds. What said the German Empire on this question? Bismarck, in his letter of instructions to the German envoy at Washington, said:

I request you respectfully to communicate to the Secretary of State, Mr. Fish, that the German Empire accepts with sincerest thanks, the invitation of the Government of the United States of America—to take part in the above-mentioned exhibition. The appointment of a special commission for the exhibition, as also of a plenipotentiary residing in Philadelphia, will therefore be made in time.

Understanding it as a governmental invitation, as everybody else would—

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] says you would not find in the printed document any acceptance from any other nation. I hold in my hand a communication addressed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] by the secretary of the commission, in which he names fourteen nations which have officially indicated their intention to participate in the national exhibition of 1876, the names of which were given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in his opening remarks, and in which he gives in addition the names of fourteen other nations from which communications have been received indicating their interest in the exhibition and their purpose to be represented. And I have learned since this discussion opened this afternoon from the honorable and distinguished chairman of the commission, General HAWLEY, who has been so justly complimented by my friend from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] that since this letter was written official intimation of the acceptance of the invitation has been received from one or two other governments.

And now we arrive at that period in the history of the great enterprise when the assistance of Congress becomes necessary. All the means that can be procured from subscriptions for stock or from other sources have been exhausted or at least all that will be available in time to be of service.

I have regretted to hear from my friend from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] generally so just and so generous, any insinuations against the good faith or the honor of the representatives from the State of Pennsylvania, arising out of what they may have said in this House or in the Senate during the progress of the two laws to which I have referred. What have they said or done in debate that is inconsistent with their subsequent action?

Mr. CAMERON said, as I recollect his remarks, that Philadelphia and Pennsylvania would contribute largely and liberally. It may be that he may have expressed the opinion that all the means would have been raised in Pennsylvania, although I think he gave no such assurance; but I know he did express the opinion that the $10,000,000 of stock, in shares of $10 each, would be subscribed for throughout the United States; and the fact that the commission have been engaged for three years in endeavoring to raise money from other sources, including subscriptions for that stock, is evidence of the good faith of Pennsylvania. She has done all that it lay in her power to do; and as evidence of that I have had placed in my hands by a Representative from that State a statement, from which it appears that Pennsylvania, the city of Philadelphia, and the citizens of the State, have nobly responded and contribute, all that can justly or fairly be required at their hands. They have raised from four to five millions of dollars. After including all available resources an additional sum not exceeding $3,000,000, and which may fall considerably short of that sum, is required to give success to the great work. No other resource is left except to apply to Congress for aid.

Now, what is there in the position of the Representatives of Pennsylvania on this floor to call for strictures or criticisms? The able gentleman from Maine alluded to the fact that an appropriation had been made by the Legislature of Pennsylvania to be applied to the erection of one of the buildings. Sir, that only shows how very strongly Pennsylvania has exerted all her constitutional power to aid this enterprise. Under the constitution of her State no money can be raised by taxation except for State purposes, and therefore, in order to satisfy this constitutional provision, Pennsylvania, in the act of her Legislature, provided that $1,000,000 should be raised and applied to the erection of what is called the "art building," a necessary and indispensable structure for the purposes of this exhibition. Again, the city of Philadelphia has appropriated $1,500,000, and citizens and corporations of Pennsylvania, including about $100,000 appropriated by New Jersey, have raised $2,000,000 more, or pledged it, so that it is secure, and the State of Pennsylvania by the appropriation to which I have referred gives $1,000,000; the whole amounting in the aggregate to $4,500,000.

It is true that Congress guarded in the acts to which I have referred against involving the nation in any expenditure, and the commissioners have carefully obeyed the legislative injunction. But Congress labored under the mistaken belief that the means could and would be raised from subscriptions to stock and other sources. It is probable that these expectations would have been realized except for the recent severe commercial revolution which produced such general loss and embarrassment throughout the country.

But what is there in these acts of Congress that should justify the charge that these gentlemen are going back upon what they have said or going back upon the action of Congress?

In the first place, look at the first act and see what it means. Here is a law wherein it is declared that this exhibition shall be under the auspices of the Government of the United States. Commissioners were to be appointed with the sanction of the President. There was imminent danger and just cause to fear that under such an act this Government would be justly and legally held responsible for all debts contracted under that law by the commission; and out of abundant caution a section was put in that these officers should receive no compensation, (and they have never claimed any,) and that the United States should not be liable for any of the expenses attending the exhibition. Nobody proposes to violate that restriction or reservation. The commissioners have carefully guarded against incurring any obligations which the United States would be bound to redeem.

How is it with the next act? Why, the early part of the section which my learned friend read provides that the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall prepare the certificates of stock, and that the counterfeiting of those certificates shall be an offense under the United States laws the same as the counterfeiting of United States currency; and then follows a proviso that nothing in the act shall be construed so as to create any liability on the part of the United States. Does anybody propose to violate these pledges? Let me tell the gentlemen who were on this floor when this law was passed that it is but a poor excuse to offer for opposing a law giving the sanction of the Government of the United States, when the honor of this nation has become pledged by it to foreign nations, because, forsooth, there were some outside pledges made by the representatives from Pennsylvania. Our predecessors as reasonable men must be presumed to have contemplated the possibility of a failure in raising the $10,000,000 by subscription to stock or otherwise, and I cannot suppose they would have passed these laws unless they were willing that Congress should in case of necessity step forward and make all the necessary appropriations that were required to uphold the credit and reputation of the United States.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question? I wish to ask him where he proposes to get this money, consistently with the pledges of the United States, with the public debt increased $2,000,000 in the last year, and with no provision for a sinking fund; and whether he thinks it becoming in anybody to borrow money to celebrate his birthday?

Mr. TREMAIN. I presume if I was a member of the Committee on Ways and Means of this House I could find means enough to pay $3,000,000. In the name of my country, the richest country on the face of God's earth—a country that during our late war raised daily for months in succession $4,000,000 from its own resources—I trust I never shall be required to find out where $3,000,000 can be raised when we have two years to raise it in.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to ask my friend from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] if he recognizes borrowing as one of our resources?

Mr. TREMAIN. I am not to be drawn into a financial discussion. I am aware that the chairman of our Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] knows all about that matter, and it is not necessary for me to enter upon that field.

At all events, Mr. Chairman, the contingency of a failure of this enterprise now confronts us. Congress has gone so far that it cannot retreat. For its action in this respect, we, who are the successors of the representatives who enacted these laws, are not responsible. Here is an exhibition launched forth with the sanction of Congress bearing the name of international, given to it by act of Congress, stamped with the imprimatur of our President, to which our Secretary of State has practically invited all nations to come. I, for one, am not willing to countermand these invitations or to allow them to be discredited. Others may decline to take any further steps to give this enterprise success and I censure them not; but for myself I cannot consent either to close the doors of the exhibition against those guests who have been invited by the nation, or to compel them to come into an exhibition conducted by only one out of the thirty-seven States and ten Territories of the Union; an exhibition so reduced in its proportions and so insignificant in extent as to excite the derision and scorn of the world.

The great States of New York and Pennsylvania lie side by side, and their people, constantly intermingling, are united by the ties of common neighborhood, friendship, and sympathy. Their strong arms were interlocked, and together they went through the war of the revolution; hand in hand they have struggled together in all the contests through which the nation has since been called to pass. As a Representative from the Empire State I would do for Pennsylvania what I should expect Pennsylvania would do for New York, if their respective positions were reversed. But this exhibition and celebration only seem to affect Pennsylvania more immediately than other States because it happens that the great event which the celebration will commemorate transpired upon her soil. It was in the city of Philadelphia that the great and immortal proclamation of human rights and universal freedom was first ushered into the world. It was then and there that the old liberty bell rang out its thrilling chimes. To Philadelphia belongs the honor of being the place from whence went forth those great truths of political equality which constitute the corner-stones of our republican institutions, and that honor will be hers forever.

But the whole nation shares in the glory and credit that have resulted from the memorable historic events which this celebration will commemorate. I believe that we shall derive from this exhibition tenfold more benefit than it will cost. Indeed it seems to me that the precious fruits which it will yield can be measured by no pecuniary standard.

I concur most fully in the vigorous and patriotic sentiments so forcibly expressed by the President in his recent special message to Congress upon this subject. He says:

> It seems fitting that the one-hundredth anniversary of our independence should be marked by an event that will display to the world the growth and progress of a nation devoted to freedom and to the pursuit of fame, fortune, and honors by the lowest citizen as well as the highest. A failure in this enterprise would be deplorable. Success can be assured by arousing public opinion to the importance of the occasion. To secure this end, in my judgment, congressional legislation is necessary to make the exposition both national and international.
> The benefits to be derived from a successful international exposition are manifold. It will necessarily be accompanied by expenses beyond the receipts from the exposition itself; but they will be compensated for many fold by the commingling of people from all sections of our own country; by bringing together the people of different nationalities; by bringing into juxtaposition, for ready examination, our own and foreign skill and progress in manufactures, agriculture, art, science, and civilization.

Mr. Chairman, there can be but one centennial celebration of the Declaration during our lives. Time is rapidly hastening, and whatever we do to give success to the exhibition must be done without delay.

Let the exhibition take place, and let it be worthy of our country! I cannot contribute by my vote to write the word failure upon the history of an enterprise so full of promise for the future; a national work which has received the sanction of my Government.

Let the Old World and the New be brought together in the great exhibition, and the bonds of fellowship and peace will be greatly strengthened by the gathering together of people from the different nations of the earth. We have good reason to believe that America will be able to make such a display that foreigners will carry away with them a better knowledge of our country and a higher regard for our free institutions.

Our people also will acquire a vast fund of knowledge concerning the productions, the results of the art, of the skill, of the inventive genius of other lands, which would otherwise be learned only by the wealthy and favored citizens who are able to travel in foreign countries. We have ground to hope and expect as a result of the exhibition that the immigration to our shores will thereafter be swollen by the accession of skilled laborers, thereby contributing to relieve us from dependence upon the workshops of Europe.

It seems to me to have been a happy conception that the centennial celebration of the Declaration should have been united with this exhibition. What an eventful century will that celebration bring before the mind! In what century of the world's history, excepting that in which the Son of Man was born, have such memorable and important events transpired as during the last hundred years! What nation has ever made such progress during the space of time as our own!

Instead of a feeble nation, with limited resources, we have become a great and powerful people, numbering more than forty millions, and, notwithstanding the carping criticism of gentlemen who ask where we are to raise $3,000,000, possessing more elements of greatness, power, and material wealth than any other on the face of the globe. Nay, more: there is no good reason why, if we remain true to ourselves and true to the principles of our fathers, we shall not continue to increase beyond our most sanguine anticipations. I hope we will not be frightened by a panic, that comes once in twenty-five years perhaps, to hang out the red flag of bankruptcy and say we cannot meet our honorable obligations.

All our trials and perils have arisen from a deviation from these principles. The only cause for any irrepressible conflict has been wiped away forever in suffering, in tears, and blood. That cause was no more the fault of the South than of the North. It was a common misfortune bequeathed to us by our fathers.

Let our people, then, from every State and Territory come to the exhibition, bringing with them their rich and varied productions, their mineral, agricultural, and horticultural specimens; their samples of manufacturing, mechanical, and inventive skill; their fabrics and materials; their tools, apparatus, and machines; everything, in short, tending to show what they have done and are doing to increase the happiness and improve the condition of mankind.

Let the people from the old thirteen Colonies come; let the citizens of the new States and Territories come; let them come with their wives and children. Let them all gather around the old council chamber, and inhale the patriotic spirit which animated those noble bodies of men who met in Philadelphia and put forth the Declaration and who framed the Constitution of the United States. Let them turn away from the dissensions and controversies of the hour, and drink deep from the original fountains of pure republicanism and genuine democracy.

Let those who but yesterday were arrayed against each other in deadly strife come and strike hands together. Let there be no further strife between us over the past. Let the dead bury the dead.

We shall see how much we yet have to live for, and what boundless fields of improvement and usefulness yet invite us to the cultivation and use of all those powers and faculties with which an all-wise Creator has endowed us.

We are citizens of a common country, having a common interest in its past and future glory and greatness. Peace having been happily restored between the North and the South, I would make that peace permanent and perpetual. One vacant place in my family circle renders it impossible that I should ever forget the existence of the late civil war. But I speak the sentiments of an overflowing heart, and I speak for the people of the North when I say that I long ardently for the coming of that day when all resentments between us, all heart-burnings, all unkindness, may be forever

> In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.

Most heartily do I respond to the patriotic and Christian sentiment recently uttered upon this floor by a distinguished Representative from the South, [Mr. LAMAR,] when in his touching eulogy upon Charles Sumner he said that if we "should know each other better we would love each other more."

It may be, Mr. Chairman, that I have given undue weight to the reasons which I have thus imperfectly stated why I shall vote for this bill; it may be that my vote will be wrong. So let it be; but in such case I can only hope that the leaf in the book of remembrance which contains the entry of my vote shall share the same fate which befell the record of Uncle Toby's oath, of which we are informed that when the recording angel had written it down a tear of sympathy for the motives which prompted the oath dropped from the angel's cheek upon the book and blotted out the record forever.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas, obtained the floor, and yielded to

Mr. KELLEY, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 2986) to appropriate $3,000,000 in aid of the centennial celebration and international exhibition of 1876, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2191) in relation to customs duties on imported fruits.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. NEGLEY. Before that motion is put I ask unanimous consent of the House to set apart next Tuesday, after one o'clock, for the consideration of the bill in relation to the safety of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to except appropriation bills.

Mr. BURCHARD. And reports from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. NEGLEY. We have been keeping it out of the way of those two committees from the 4th of February last.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I must insist upon the reports of the Committee on Ways and Means being excepted.

Mr. NEGLEY. I will except reports from the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COBURN. I object to that order.

Mr. NEGLEY. Then I give notice that on Monday next I will move a suspension of the rules so as to make such an order.

Mr. SENER. I ask that at the session of to-night business may be conducted without regard to a quorum.

Mr. SPEER. Is it competent for the House to make such an order as that?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SPEER. Does it require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. SPEER. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] that the House now take a recess until half-past seven o'clock p. m., when the House will meet for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. BURCHARD in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

NEW MEXICO.

Mr. FORT. I ask unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on Territories upon the bill for the admission of the Territory of New Mexico as a State, and that it be ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

No objection was made, and it was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to inquire of the Chair if there is a quorum present? I wish to say that it may as well be understood first as last that at these evening sessions, which we must commence holding very soon, there must be a quorum before we can proceed with business. It is not proper that appropriation bills should be acted upon with hardly fifteen members in the Hall.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. As I understand it the appropriation bill is not before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. The Indian appropriation bill is to be taken up in Committee of the Whole this evening.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move that the rules be suspended and the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. RANDALL. On that question I call for a division.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that call.

Mr. RANDALL. I will not.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 10, noes 4.

Mr. RANDALL. That is not a quorum.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RANDALL, and the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, to act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 21, noes 2; no quorum voting.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move a call of the House.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MACDOUGALL, it was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, there were—ayes 15, noes 3.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE was agreed to.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll; when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Banning, Barnum, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bell, Bowen, Bright, Buckner, Bundy, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. Cobb, Comingo, Conger, Cotton, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Crooke, Crossland, Crutchfield, Curtis, Darrall, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Durham, Eames, Eden, Eldredge, Elliott, Farwell, Field, Freeman, Giddings, Glover, Gooch, Gunckel, Hagans, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Harmer, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Havens, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, Gerry W. Hazelton, John W. Hazelton, Herndon, Hersey, E. Rockwood Hoar, George F. Hoar, Hodges, Holman, Hooper, Hoskins, Houghton, Hubbell, Hunton, Hynes, Kasson, Kelley, Kellogg, Kendall, Killinger, Lamar, Lamison, Lawson, Leach, Lewis, Lofland, Lowndes, Magee, Marshall, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, James W. McDill, McJunkin, McKee, McNulta, Mellish, Mills, Mitchell, Moore, Morey, Morrison, Myers, Neal, Nesmith, Niles, Nunn, O'Brien, Parsons, Pelham, Perry, Phelps, Phillips, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Thomas C. Platt, Potter, Pratt, Purman, Rainey, Ransier, Rapier, Read, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, Rusk, Milton Sayler, John G. Schumaker, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Sloss, Small, Smart, A. Herr Smith, H. Boardman Smith, J. Ambler Smith, John Q. Smith, William A. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now proceed to call the names of absentees for the presentation of excuses. The officers of the House will see that the doors be closed.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I was in the Hall during the last roll-call. I did not hear my name called. I want it called now that I may answer.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the gentleman be allowed to answer to his name.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll of absentees for the presentation of excuses.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No other motion is now in order.

Mr. CONGER. I do not wish to make a motion. I was in the House——

Many MEMBERS. Order! Call the roll!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will wait until there is perfect quiet in the House.

Mr. CONGER. It seems quiet now. I was in the House——

Mr. GARFIELD. I believe the order is to call the roll.

Mr. CONGER. Let my friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] wait a moment. I was in the House when the roll was being called the second time. I desire to have my name recorded as one of those present on that roll-call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll, and when the gentleman's name is reached he can be heard.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I desire to make for myself a similar request to that of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

The Clerk proceeded to call the names of absentees for the presentation of excuses.

GEORGE M. ADAMS: No excuse offered.

WILLIAM J. ALBERT: No excuse offered.

STEVENSON ARCHER.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland. My colleague, Mr. ARCHER, is confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. STORM. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM E. ARTHUR: No excuse offered.

THOMAS S. ASHE.

Mr. ASHE. I had a long walk here, and I may have been somewhat misled by my watch as to the time.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY B. BANNING: No excuse offered.

WILLIAM H. BARNUM: No excuse offered.

GRANVILLE BARRERE.

Mr. BARRERE. I was in the House at twenty minutes of eight o'clock. When I left home I supposed I had abundant time to get here. But when I came in the roll was being called, and the B's had been passed.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY W. BARRY: No excuse offered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move, in order to save time, that all those be excused who are now in the Hall.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

LYMAN K. BASS: No excuse offered.

JOSIAH W. BEGOLE.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. BEGOLE is at the door. There has been sickness in his family for the last four or six weeks. I move that he be excused.

Mr. WILBER. I know that Mr. BEGOLE's family have been sick, and it has been necessary for him to give them a good deal of attention.

The motion of Mr. BRADLEY was agreed to.

HIRAM P. BELL: No excuse offered.

Mr. DONNAN. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there a quorum present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is not.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. A division upon this question will show whether there is a quorum present.

The motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes 20, noes 72.

Mr. GARFIELD. I believe no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum has voted.

Mr. POLAND. I trust the House will hear a suggestion. I have no doubt that the Chair is technically right in saying that the roll must be called; but according to my impression the practice has always been that where gentlemen came in during the second call and after their names had been passed, they have been allowed to have their names recorded before any further proceedings.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to dispense with all further proceedings under the call is lost.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that those who have not answered to their names shall have the privilege to do so, in order that we may know whether there is a quorum present now or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already decided the motion lost, and the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania therefore is not in order.

Mr. CONGER. I appeal from that decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has decided, and when he made his decision no appeal was taken, and an appeal from that decision, therefore, is not now in order. The Clerk will proceed with the call of absentees for excuses.

REESE T. BOWEN.

Mr. BOWEN. Mr. Speaker, I came into the Hall just as my name was called.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN M. BRIGHT: No excuse offered.

AYLETT H. BUCKNER: No excuse offered.

HEZEKIAH S. BUNDY: No excuse offered.

BENJAMIN F. BUTLER: No excuse offered.

RODERICK R. BUTLER: No excuse offered.

JOHN H. CALDWELL: No excuse offered.

JOSEPH G. CANNON.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I was in the House before the doors were closed.

Mr. CESSNA. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

THOMAS J. CASON.
Mr. ORTH. My colleague is detained from the House by illness, and I move that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
AMOS CLARK, jr.: No excuse offered.
FREEMAN CLARKE.
Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move that my colleague be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
CHARLES CLAYTON.
Mr. BRADLEY. I move that the gentleman from California be excused on account of sickness.
The motion was agreed to.
ISAAC CLEMENTS.
Mr. CLEMENTS. I was here before the doors were closed.
Mr. RANDALL. I move that the gentleman be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
HIESTER CLYMER.
Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move that the gentleman be excused, as he is now present.
Mr. CLYMER. Here all the time.
The motion was agreed to.
CLINTON L. COBB.
Mr. FIELD. I move that he be excused; he is in the gallery and cannot get upon the floor, as the doors are closed.
The motion was disagreed to.
STEPHEN A. COBB: No excuse offered.
ABRAM COMINGO.
Mr. RANDALL. I move, as the gentleman is present, that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
OMAR D. CONGER.
Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will agree not to make a speech I will move that he be excused.
Mr. CONGER. I understand this is a call for members to offer excuses.
Mr. LAMPORT. I move that the gentleman be excused.
Mr. CONGER. I wish to say this——
Mr. NIBLACK. I object to debate.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will preserve order.
Mr. CONGER. No business will be done until I am heard.
Mr. FIELD. The gentleman will not be excused if he insists.
Mr. CONGER. I was in this House when the second roll was called, and I called the attention of the Chair to it. I demanded then my name should be called, as all precedents since I have been a member of Congress required it, as I was in the House a long time before the doors were closed. I claim every gentleman in this House before the last name on the roll is called has a right to have his name called, and not be put in a false position here or elsewhere. There are other gentlemen who have been subjected to the same thing heretofore, and who have also had their names put on the roll. I, sir, have never been absent from the House except twice on a roll-call for five years, and I do not desire it shall unnecessarily appear otherwise. I have no excuse to offer, because I came here in time.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the thirty-sixth rule, under which the Chair is now acting.
The Clerk read as follows:

Upon the call of the House, the names of the members shall be called over by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; after which the names of the absentees shall again be called over; the doors shall then be shut, and those for whom no excuse or insufficient excuses are made may, by order of those present, if fifteen in number, be taken into custody as they appear, or may be sent for and taken into custody, wherever to be found, by special messengers to be appointed for that purpose.

Mr. CONGER. That rule cannot apply to any member in this House before the doors are closed, because they may be sent for. All members who are in this Hall are equally a part of this body to go on with the proceedings whether they were here on the first roll-call or on the second. I claim that no gentleman who was in the House during the roll-call shall be called upon for an excuse.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair begs to say that he has followed literally the directions of the rule. It has been moved that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] be excused. The Chair hears no objection.
AYLETT R. COTTON.
Mr. COTTON. I was in the Hall before the call of the roll was completed.
Mr. BECK. I move that the gentleman be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
SAMUEL S. COX.
Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I have received a letter from Mr. COX stating that he is detained at his house sick.
Mr. STORM. Mr. COX is absent by leave of the House.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is sufficient excuse.
THOMAS J. CREAMER: No excuse offered.
ALVAH CROCKER: No excuse offered.
PHILIP S. CROOKE: No excuse offered.
EDWARD CROSSLAND.
Mr. BECK. Mr. CROSSLAND is absent because of sickness. He is not well enough to be here.
Mr. HEREFORD. I move that the gentleman be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
WILLIAM CRUTCHFIELD: No excuse offered.
CARLTON B. CURTIS: No excuse offered.
CHESTER B. DARRALL: No excuse offered.
JOHN J. DAVIS: No excuse offered.
HENRY L. DAWES: No excuse offered.
DAVID M. DEWITT: No excuse offered.
SAMUEL A. DOBBINS: No excuse offered.
WILLIAM G. DONNAN.
Mr. DONNAN. I made the best time on record in my efforts to be here, and was in the Hall before the roll-call was completed but after my name had been called.
Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the gentleman be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. ATKINS. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.
The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ATKINS, there were—ayes 10, noes 56.
So the motion was not agreed to.
R. HOLLAND DUELL: No excuse offered.
MILTON J. DURHAM: No excuse offered.
BENJAMIN T. EAMES: No excuse offered.
JOHN R. EDEN: No excuse offered.
CHARLES A. ELDREDGE: No excuse offered.
ROBERT B. ELLIOTT.
Mr. CAIN. Mr. ELLIOTT is absent by leave of the House.
CHARLES B. FARWELL: No excuse offered.
MOSES W. FIELD.
Mr. FIELD. I was in the Hall when my name was called, but I did not hear it.
Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I move that the gentleman be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
JAMES C. FREEMAN.
Mr. FREEMAN. I was in the House before the roll-call was completed.
Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I move that the gentleman be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
DEWITT C. GIDDINGS.
Mr. GIDDINGS. I was in the Hall before the roll-call was completed, but after my name was called.
Mr. VANCE. I move that the gentleman be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
JOHN M. GLOVER.
Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. GLOVER is absent on account of sickness. I move that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
DANIEL W. GOOCH: No excuse offered.
LEWIS B. GUNCKEL.
Mr. GUNCKEL. I came into the Hall during the last roll-call, but after my name had been called.
Mr. RANDALL. I move that the gentleman be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
J. MARSHALL HAGANS: No excuse offered.
ROBERT S. HALE: No excuse offered.
ROBERT HAMILTON: No excuse offered.
ALFRED C. HARMER: No excuse offered.
HENRY R. HARRIS.
Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. I intended to be here in good time, and was here some time before the roll-call was completed.
Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I move that the gentleman be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia. I desire to say also that my colleague, Mr. BELL, is detained by sickness. I move that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
HORACE H. HARRISON.
Mr. HARRISON. I was here before the roll-call was completed.
Mr. SAWYER. I move that the gentleman be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. RANDALL. I think there is a quorum now here and that we may proceed to business. If there be no objection I would now move that the gentlemen who are present be allowed to answer to their names; and I would include in the motion those who are outside of the doors.
Mr. GARFIELD. Let us go on with the call of the absentees.
Several MEMBERS. Go on.
HENRY H. HATHORN: No excuse offered.
HARRISON E. HAVENS.
Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. HAVENS is in the gallery sick. I move that he be excused.
The motion was not agreed to.
JOSEPH B. HAWLEY: No excuse offered.
CHARLES HAYS: No excuse offered.
GERRY W. HAZELTON: No excuse offered.
JOHN W. HAZELTON.
Mr. HAZELTON, of New Jersey. My excuse is that I did not start soon enough to be here at the assembling of the House.
Mr. STARKWEATHER. I move that the gentleman be excused.
The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM S. HERNDON.

Mr. HANCOCK. My colleague, Mr. HERNDON, is absent by leave of the House.

SAMUEL F. HERSEY.

Mr. STORM. Mr. HERSEY has leave of absence.

E. ROCKWOOD HOAR: No excuse offered.

GEORGE F. HOAR.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Mr. GEORGE F. HOAR is absent by leave of the House.

ASA HODGES: No excuse offered.

WILLIAM S. HOLMAN.

Mr. NIBLACK. My colleague, Mr. HOLMAN, is absent by leave of the House.

SAMUEL HOOPER: No excuse offered.

GEORGE G. HOSKINS: No excuse offered.

SHERMAN O. HOUGHTON.

Mr. PAGE. My colleague, Mr. HOUGHTON, is absent on account of sickness. He was not sufficiently well to be here. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JAY A. HUBBELL.

Mr. CONGER. My colleague, Mr. HUBBELL, is on a committee which has leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

Mr. LOWE. Is the committee in session now? Mr. HUBBELL is at the door.

Mr. BRADLEY. I think it is a mistake that Mr. HUBBELL is at the door. I venture the assertion that he is reviewing testimony, and I move that he be excused.

Mr. FRYE. He is at the door looking through the glass.

Mr. CONGER. He is on a committee which has leave to sit during the sessions of the House, and if that means anything, it means that he may be absent during the sessions of the House.

The question was taken on Mr. BRADLEY'S motion, and it was not agreed to.

EPPA HUNTON.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. My colleague, Mr. HUNTON, is absent from the city from necessity, and I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM J. HYNES: No excuse offered.

JOHN A. KASSON: No excuse offered.

WILLIAM D. KELLEY.

Mr. O'NEILL. Judge KELLEY said to me just before he left the House this afternoon, that he was too unwell to come here this evening. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

STEPHEN W. KELLOGG.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. My colleague, Mr. KELLOGG, has been called home by sickness in his family. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES W. KENDALL: No excuse offered.

JOHN W. KILLINGER: No excuse offered.

LUICUS Q. C. LAMAR.

Mr. COMINGO. It is well known that Mr. LAMAR'S health is such that he cannot attend night sessions. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES N. LAMISON.

Mr. BERRY. My colleague, Mr. LAMISON, is unwell, and I move that he be excused.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I know that to be a fact, for I rode up with him in the car.

The motion was not agreed to.

JOHN D. LAWSON: No excuse offered.

JAMES M. LEACH: No excuse offered.

BARBOUR LEWIS: No excuse offered.

JAMES R. LOFLAND: No excuse offered.

LLOYD LOWNDES, jr.: No excuse offered.

JOHN A. MAGEE: No excuse offered.

SAMUEL S. MARSHALL: No excuse offered.

JAMES S. MARTIN.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. MARTIN told me that he was unwell this evening. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

HORACE MAYNARD: No excuse offered.

ALEXANDER S. MCDILL.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have just come from the room of Mr. MCDILL, of Wisconsin, and I know that he is sick. That is the reason why I was not here in time myself. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES W. MCDILL: No excuse offered.

EBENEZER MCJUNKIN: No excuse offered.

GEORGE C. MCKEE: No excuse offered.

JOHN MCNULTA: No excuse offered.

DAVID B. MELLISH: No excuse offered.

ROGER Q. MILLS.

Mr. MCLEAN. My colleague, Mr. MILLS, was quite unwell yesterday and was complaining to-day. I am satisfied that he is too unwell to be here or he would be here. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

ALEXANDER MITCHELL: No excuse offered.

WILLIAM S. MOORE: No excuse offered.

FRANK MOREY: No excuse offered.

WILLIAM R. MORRISON.

Mr. CLEMENTS. My colleague, Mr. MORRISON, is unavoidably absent, and I move that he be excused:

The motion was agreed to.

LEONARD MYERS: No excuse offered.

LAWRENCE T. NEAL.

Mr. JEWETT. Mr. NEAL is absent by leave of the House.

JAMES W. NESMITH: No excuse offered.

JASON NILES: No excuse offered.

DAVID A. NUNN: No excuse offered.

WILLIAM J. O'BRIEN: No excuse offered.

RICHARD C. PARSONS: No excuse offered.

CHARLES PELHAM: No excuse offered.

ELI PERRY: No excuse offered.

WILLIAM WALTER PHELPS: No excuse offered.

WILLIAM A. PHILLIPS.

Mr. LOWE. My colleague, Mr. PHILLIPS, is suffering from bronchitis, and that is the reason he is not here. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

AUSTIN F. PIKE.

Mr. PIKE. I was here during the second call, but after my name had been passed on the roll.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES H. PLATT, jr.: No excuse offered.

THOMAS C. PLATT: No excuse offered.

CLARKSON N. POTTER: No excuse offered.

HENRY O. PRATT: No excuse offered.

WILLIAM J. PURMAN: No excuse offered.

JOSEPH H. RAINEY.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. RAINEY is absent by leave of the House.

ALONZO J. RANSIER: No excuse offered.

JAMES T. RAPIER: No excuse offered.

WILLIAM B. READ: No excuse offered.

WILLIAM R. ROBERTS: No excuse offered.

JAMES C. ROBINSON: No excuse offered.

JAMES W. ROBINSON: No excuse offered.

JEREMIAH M. RUSK.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. RUSK is absent by leave of the House.

MILTON SAYLER.

Mr. SAYLER, of Ohio. I was detained until late this afternoon by business of the House. It is my fortune to live at the Arlington. I took a very hasty dinner; I dispensed with soup and fish, and did not get any ice-cream or anything of that kind. In connection with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] I invested a dollar and a half in a carriage to come here. I got here during the second roll-call, but after my name had been passed. I did the best I could under the circumstances.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to upon a division—ayes 64, noes not counted.

JOHN G. SCHUMAKER: No excuse offered.

GLENNI W. SCOFIELD.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Mr. SCOFIELD is absent on account of sickness in his family. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY J. SCUDDER.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Mr. SCUDDER is absent by leave of the House.

ISAAC W. SCUDDER.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey, made written application during the day for leave of absence. It is now upon the Speaker's desk. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES B. SENER: No excuse offered.

CHRISTOPHER C. SHEATS: No excuse offered.

LIONEL A. SHELDON: No excuse offered.

ISAAC R. SHERWOOD: No excuse offered.

LAZARUS D. SHOEMAKER.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Mr. SHOEMAKER is absent on account of sickness. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

ANDREW SLOAN: No excuse offered.

JOSEPH H. SLOSS: No excuse offered.

WILLIAM B. SMALL.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Mr. SMALL is sick at his room, and unable to be out to-night. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES S. SMART.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Mr. SMART is absent on leave.

A. HERR SMITH: No excuse offered.

H. BOARDMAN SMITH.

Mr. LAMPORT. Mr. SMITH, of New York, is absent on leave.

J. AMBLER SMITH: No excuse offered.

JOHN Q. SMITH.

Mr. BROMBERG. Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, is absent on account of sickness. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM A. SMITH: No excuse offered.
OLIVER P. SNYDER: No excuse offered.
MILTON I. SOUTHARD.
Mr. JEWETT. Mr. SOUTHARD is wholly unfit to be out to-night on account of the condition of his health. I move that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
R. MILTON SPEER.
Mr. RANDALL. Before the doors were closed this evening I received a note from Mr. SPEER stating that he was too ill to leave his room to-night, and requesting if there was a call of the House I should make it known. He wrote in good faith; no one who knows that gentleman believes that he would not be here if he was able. I move that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
WILLIAM P. SPRAGUE: No excuse offered.
EDWIN O. STANARD.
ELISHA D. STANDIFORD.
Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. STANDIFORD is absent by leave of the House.
ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS.
Mr. COOK. Mr. STEPHENS is absent by leave of the House.
CHARLES ST. JOHN.
Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Mr. ST. JOHN is absent by reason of a death in his family. I move that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
WILLIAM H. STONE.
Mr. BLAND. My colleague is absent I believe on account of sickness in his family. I move that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
WILLIAM H. H. STOWELL.
Mr. AVERILL. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. STOWELL] is absent on account of severe illness. I move that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
HORACE B. STRAIT: No excuse offered.
JAMES D. STRAWBRIDGE: No excuse offered.
THOMAS SWANN: No excuse offered.
J. HALE SYPHER: No excuse offered.
ALEXANDER W. TAYLOR.
Mr. CESSNA. I move that my colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
CHARLES R. THOMAS: No excuse offered.
JACOB M. THORNBURGH: No excuse offered.
LEMUEL TODD.
Mr. ALBRIGHT. Mr. TODD left the House this afternoon sick.
Mr. GARFIELD. I move that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
WASHINGTON TOWNSEND.
Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. TOWNSEND, who is the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, was detained in his committee-room this afternoon on some business relating to the work of that committee until a full hour after the adjournment of the House; and as he had to go to the upper end of the city for his dinner, I presume he has not had time to get back here. I move that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
LYMAN TREMAIN.
Mr. WILBER. Mr. TREMAIN has been sick a great deal this winter and frequently confined to his room. He is not able to be out at night. I move that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
ALFRED M. WADDELL.
Mr. ASHE. Mr. WADDELL has been suffering from severe sickness. I move that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
ALEXANDER S. WALLACE.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. WALLACE, has leave of absence.
JOSIAH T. WALLS: No excuse offered.
JASPER D. WARD.
Mr. FORT. My colleague, Mr. WARD, is in sight, and I move that he be excused.
Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope my colleague will be excused on the ground of sickness. It is well known to gentlemen of the House that he is very delicate and unable to be out at night!
Mr. CLEMENTS. I understand that our colleague is unavoidably detained in the gallery on account of the doors being closed.
The motion of Mr. FORT was not agreed to.
MARCUS L. WARD.
Mr. HAZELTON, of New Jersey. I am sorry to say that the prevailing epidemic has seized one of the New Jersey members. My colleague, Mr. WARD, is absent on account of sickness. I move that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
ALEXANDER WHITE.
Mr. VANCE. I understand that Judge WHITE is sick. I move that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
JOHN O. WHITEHOUSE: No excuse offered.
RICHARD H. WHITELEY.
Mr. CONGER. I move that Mr. WHITELEY be excused on account of ill health.
The motion was agreed to.

ASA H. WILLIE: No excuse offered.
WILLIAM W. WILSHIRE: No excuse offered.
JEREMIAH M. WILSON.
Mr. TYNER. My colleague, Mr. WILSON, has been almost continuously absent from the House for several weeks past, attending to the business of a very important committee; and during the evenings he is engaged in looking up testimony. I move that he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
SIMEON K. WOLFE: No excuse offered.
FERNANDO WOOD.
Mr. STORM. Mr. WOOD is absent by leave of the House.
STEWART L. WOODFORD: No excuse offered.
JOHN D. YOUNG: No excuse offered.
PIERCE M. B. YOUNG: No excuse offered.
Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring in the absentees.
Mr. FIELD. I move that Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, be excused on account of sickness.
Mr. GARFIELD. I move the previous question on my motion.
Mr. NEGLEY. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.
Mr. GARFIELD. Let the Sergeant-at-Arms bring in the members who are now outside and we shall have a quorum.
Mr. NEGLEY. We have had this farce long enough. If it is to be continued we had better adjourn.
Mr. RANDALL. It is due to the country that gentlemen should come here and attend to the public business.
Mr. NEGLEY. It is due also to the country——
Mr. GARFIELD. I object to debate and insist on my motion.
Mr. FIELD. I hope the Chair will entertain my motion that Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, be excused.
Mr. GARFIELD. There is a motion pending.
Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. It is a well-known fact that General BUTLER is sick. He ought to be excused.
The question being taken on the motion of Mr. NEGLEY that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 26, noes 82.
Mr. GARFIELD. I insist on my motion.
Mr. FIELD. I hope my motion will be submitted.
Mr. PAGE. I insist that the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FIELD] be entertained by the Chair.
Mr. GARFIELD. I yield for that motion.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Although the roll-call has been completed, the Chair, if there be no objection, will entertain the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FIELD] that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. GARFIELD. I now renew my motion that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring in the absentees.
Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I ask that my colleague, Mr. CROCKER, be excused.
Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot yield any further till my motion is acted on.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. RANDALL. How near are we to a quorum?
Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have the absentees brought in and we can then find that out.
The Sergeant-at Arms appeared at the bar of the House having absentees in custody, but was not announced.
Mr. SHANKS. I rise to a point of order. We cannot tell those in custody from those who are not in custody.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those who are not in custody will please take their seats.
Mr. BECK. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.
Mr. DURHAM. I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, that I am on two committees which have the right to sit during the sessions of the House, and as I have been engaged on the business of one of these committees, even if I am marked down as not present I am excused under the order of the House.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is excused of course.
Mr. GARFIELD. Is there a quorum present?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is unable to state, but he is of the opinion there is a quorum present.
The committee divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes 52.
So all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.
The doors were reopened.
Mr. GARFIELD. I now rise to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to proceed with the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.
The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. POLAND in the chair) on the bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.
The CHAIRMAN. The pending amendment when the committee rose was moved by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE,] in line 188, to insert "50;" so it will read as follows:

ARAPAHOES, CHEYENNES, APACHES, KIOWAS, COMANCHES, AND WICHITAS.

For subsistence of the Arapahoe, Cheyenne, Apache, Kiowa, Comanche, and Wichita Indians (and transportation of the same,) who have been collected upon the reservations set apart for their use and occupation, $250,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall be expended only on behalf of those Indians who go and remain upon said reservations and refrain from hostilities.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. That amendment was recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. Is that an increase?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. It is an increase of $50,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is necessary, and is unanimously recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 46.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Is there a quorum voting?

The CHAIRMAN. There is not.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, and Mr. WARD of Illinois, were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 30; no quorum voting.

The roll was then called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Barnum, Barry, Bass, Buckner, Bundy, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cobb, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Crooke, Darrall, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Duell, Eden, Eldredge, Elliott, Farwell, Glover, Gooch, Hagans, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Harmer, Hathorn, Joseph R. Thomas, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Waddell, Wallace, Walls, Marcus L. Ward, White, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Wilshire, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodford, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young.

The committee rose; and Mr. BURCHARD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. POLAND reported that the committee finding itself without a quorum had, under the rule, caused the roll to be called, and directed him to report the names of the absentees to the House to be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. More than a quorum of members is present, and the committee will resume its session.

The committee then resumed its session, Mr. POLAND in the chair.

The question recurred on Mr. LOUGHRIDGE's amendment.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 89; no quorum voting.

The roll was then called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Barnum, Barry, Bass, Buckner, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Freeman Clarke, Stephen A. Cobb, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Crooke, Darrall, Davis, Dawes, DeWitt, Duell, Eden, Eldredge, Elliott, Farwell, Fort, Glover, Gooch, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Ward, White, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Wilshire, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodford, Woodworth, and John D. Young.

The committee then rose; and Mr. BURCHARD having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. POLAND reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration the Indian appropriation bill, upon a division found itself without a quorum; and thereupon he directed the roll to be called, and herewith reported the names of the absentees to the House to be entered on the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The roll-call shows the presence of a quorum, one hundred and fifty-two members having answered to their names.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, it is very evident that no business will be transacted to-night. I move that the committee do now rise, with a view to moving in the House that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that. Let us have an hour's work on the bill.

Several MEMBERS. No debate.

Mr. STORM. What does this kind of work amount to?

The question being taken on the motion that the committee rise, there were—ayes 82, noes 61.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BURCHARD having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. POLAND reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Indian appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken, there were—yeas 77, nays 75, not voting 138; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atkins, Averill, Barber, Bass, Beck, Begole, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buffinton, Cain, Cannon, Clayton, Clymer, Clinton L. Ward, White, Whitehouse, Whiteley, Wilshire, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Wolfe, Wood, Woodford, Woodworth, and John D. Young—138.

So the motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at ten o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ALBERT: The petition of Julia Watkins, widow of Captain Thomas H. Watkins, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee: The petition of Thomas H. Reeves, captain, United States Army, retired, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COBURN: The petition of George W. Steele, late lieutenant-colonel One hundred and first Indiana Volunteers, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of George W. Brown, late private Company K, One hundred and ninth United States Colored Troops, for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ELKINS: The petition of Franklin Benedict, of Santa Fé, New Mexico, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Vincent St. Vrain, of Mora, New Mexico, administrator of C. St. Vrain, deceased, to be reimbursed for freight paid pursuant to orders from the Quartermaster's Department, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HARRISON: The petition of citizens of Lewis County, Tennessee, for a post-route from Henryville, Lawrence County, to Napier's Furnace, in Lewis County, Tennessee, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SENER: The petition of Thomas H. Boggs and others, of the county of King George, Virginia, for compensation for the destruction of Fletcher's chapel by United States troops in 1863, to the Commiteee on War Claims.

By Mr. SPRAGUE: The petition of Wilson Ball, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WOOD: The petition of Jerome A. Eisenlord, administrator of the estate of Dr. Alonzo F. Eisenlord, to be paid for services of said Alonzo F. Eisenlord as surgeon United States Volunteers, to the Committee on War Claims.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 6, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SUMNER MEMORIAL ADDRESSES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed three thousand copies for the use of the Senate and five thousand copies for the use of the House of Representatives of the addresses made in the Senate and in the House of Representatives upon the death of Hon. Charles Sumner, and that the Secretary of the Treasury have printed the portrait of Mr. Sumner to accompany the same.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORTS ON IMMIGRATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That three thousand copies of the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of January 21, 1874, with the accompanying reports, concerning the immigration service and the better protection of immigrants to the United States, be printed for the use of the House.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. No. 3252) to remove the political disabilities of George N. Hollins, of Maryland;

A bill (H. R. No. 3253) to remove the legal and political disabilities of Richard T. Allison, of Maryland; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3254) to relieve the persons therein named of their legal and political disabilities.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill (H. R. No. 203) to create two additional land districts in the State of Kansas; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3162) for the relief of settlers on railroad lands.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 3258) to amend the acts of June 30, 1834, and February 13, 1862, to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indians; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3080) to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands within the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations, and to confirm existing leases.

The bill (H. R. No. 3257) authorizing the Secretary of War to sell unserviceable ordnance stores, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 94) directing the commissioners of claims to send to Congress without delay the claims decided prior to April 1, 1874, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CEMETERY AT SALT LAKE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 347) granting a portion of the United States military reservation at Salt Lake City for cemetery purposes.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert the following:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to set apart a tract of land, not exceeding twenty acres in extent, in the United States military reservation of Camp Douglas, near Salt Lake City, in the Territory of Utah, to be used as a public cemetery, under such rules and regulations as he shall establish for the protection, care, and management of such cemetery. And he shall cause the same to be laid off and platted in convenient and suitable lots, which shall be forever devoted to the purpose of the burial of the dead. And he may set apart forever to each of the religious denominations organized in Salt Lake City which shall file with him proof of their organization a lot not to exceed one acre in size, and of convenient shape, which such denominations may inclose and ornament as they see fit, to be used for the purpose of burial; and two acres shall be reserved as a potter's field, or common burying-ground, which may be inclosed and ornamented by the authority of the said city.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to that bill. I do not know anything about it. If it is a new proposition, it ought to be referred and be considered by the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it had better be referred.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; let it be referred.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] takes some interest in the matter, and perhaps it had better lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will withdraw the bill for the present.

Mr. LOGAN subsequently said: I have examined the substitute of the House for Senate bill No. 347, which was laid aside, and I see no objection to it. I hope that it will be concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

ASSAY OFFICE IN MONTANA.

The bill (H. R. No. 3255) to establish an assay office at Helena, in the Territory of Montana, was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That is a bill which has twice passed the Senate, and it is in precisely the same phraseology with a bill reported by the Committee on Finance. I see no object in having it referred. I ask that it be acted on now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator if he has compared it, so that he knows it is the same bill which we reported?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Precisely; word for word.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to establish an assay office at Helena, to be conducted under the provisions of the act entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relative to the mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States," approved February 12, 1873; and for that purpose to cause to be constructed a suitable building, and to provide the same with the necessary fixtures and apparatus, at a cost not exceeding $50,000; which sum is appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FENTON. I present the remonstrance of a large number of persons engaged in the transportation of swine by railroad from the Western to the Eastern States, representing those who are engaged in this transportation, residing in the cities of Buffalo, Rochester, Albany, and New York City, in the State of New York; Cleveland, Toledo, and other points in Ohio; and Erie, Pennsylvania, who pray that there shall be an exception made from House bill No. 2650 to the end that swine shall be exempt from the provisions of that bill in so far as not to make it imperative to unload and reload them unnecessarily while in transit, as is contemplated in the bill. This remonstrance is forwarded to me by Messrs. Metcalfe & Cushing, of Buffalo, New York, who are very well known to me. I ask that it be referred to the committee having the subject in charge.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented a memorial of Choctaw delegates, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 680, for the relief of certain persons of African descent; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented a memorial of Byam, Carleton & Co., and other manufacturers of friction matches, protesting against the passage of the bill (S. No. 728) to define a gross of matches, to provide for uniform packages, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of John P. Squire & Co., of Boston, and others, largely engaged in the transportation of swine by railroad from the Western to the Eastern States, praying Congress to except some swine from the provisions of the bill now before the Senate (H. R. No. 2650) to amend the act entitled "An act to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroad or other means of transportation within the United States," approved March 3, 1873, in so far as not to make it imperative to unload and reload them unnecessarily while in transit as contemplated with other classes of live stock referred to in that bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. THURMAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Major J. W. Nichols, paymaster, United States Army, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NOTICES OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I desire to give notice that at some fitting time during next week I shall call up the bill (S. No. 651) to provide for the transmission of correspondence by telegraph, and ask the Senate to consider it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I give notice that to-morrow morning, as soon as the morning business is finished, I will endeavor to call up the bill (S. No. 733) regulating gas-works. The report upon that bill was printed and received here the day before yesterday. I think the bill will not take much longer than the time necessary to read it in order to meet the approbation of the Senate. I hope Senators who take any interest in the matter will be prepared and will give their assent to taking up the bill to-morrow morning.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, to report it back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. This, I understand from the chairman, to be a report from the majority of the committee. I desire to state so far as I am concerned that I do not wish it to go out as the unanimous report of the committee. There are provisions in the bill in which the committee are united. Free banking, for instance, which I have advocated, is incorporated and met my ready approval. There are other features, however, of the bill that do not meet the approval of the minority. I, as one of that minority, deem it my right and avail myself of the privilege, to state that much pertaining to the bill. I hope it may be so understood.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2789) for the relief of John S. Dickson, late captain of paroled prisoners, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2699) for the relief of Robert Tillson & Co., of Quincy, Illinois, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of David Klein, praying compensation for the use of his patent by the United States for the construction of ponton bridges for crossing navigable streams, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 502) for the relief of Mrs. Martha Vaughn and Mrs. Louisa Jackman, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2788) for the relief of H. P. Ingram and John K. Askins, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1322) for the relief of George S. Gustin, late a private Company D, Seventy-fourth Regiment Illinois Volunteers, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2697) to create an additional major of artillery and to promote Captain James M. Robertson, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Peter Reitz and William S. Babcock, praying compensation for recapturing the steamers Prairie State and Prima Donna, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 704) for the relief of the officers and men of the United States Army who were sufferers by the wreck of the bark Forrest, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 622) for the relief of John N. Newman, late an acting first lieutenant of Company B, Ninth Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2092) for the relief of John W. Divine, late assistant surgeon of the Eleventh Regiment of Tennessee Cavalry, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2205) for the relief of P. Hornbrook, reported it, without amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 759) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the creation of corporations in the District of Columbia by general law," approved May 5, 1870, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2801) to place on the retired list of the Navy M. H. Plunkett, late second assistant engineer of the regular Navy, reported it without amendment.

CAPTAIN HURTT'S TRIAL.

Mr. LOGAN. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3085) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain papers called for by resolution of the House, have instructed me to report the same back without amendment. I ask the consent of the Senate for action at this time. It will take but a moment, and it is a matter of some importance.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, porceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of War to employ such number of temporary clerks as may be necessary to speedily copy and furnish to the House the papers heretofore called for in the matter of the trial of Captain Hurtt, by resolution of March 10, 1874, and appropriates $250, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of defraying the expenses thereof.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator explain the bill?

Mr. LOGAN. I will give a very short explanation. Certain charges have been published in the newspapers in reference to a record in the War Department. The Secretary of War asks for temporary clerks sufficient to make a copy of it, that it may be sent to the House of Representatives, in answer to a resolution calling for it. He states that he has not the force to do it. The House passed this bill appropriating $250 for the purpose of making a copy of the record and furnishing it to Congress. That is all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 781) for the relief of James M. Pugh; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GILBERT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 782) to grant a site for the Peabody school in Saint Augustine, Florida; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 783) for the relief of Mrs. Selina Barclay, widow of Robert Barclay, late of Portsmouth, Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and, with an accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BOREMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 44) to establish the Territory of Pembina, and to provide a temporary government therefor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have a resolution to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Resolutions are now in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the eleventh rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following words:

Nor shall debate be allowed upon any motion to dispose of a pending matter and proceed to consider another.

When the question is under consideration the debate thereon shall be germane to such question or to the subject to which it relates.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PRATT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2190) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia has made a motion to take up another bill.

Mr. PRATT. I ask my friend from West Virginia to give way this morning. I gave notice on Monday last that I should report back this House bill, and on reporting it submit some remarks to the Senate explanatory of its merits. I tried to get the floor yesterday for that purpose, but other business consumed the entire morning hour. I should be glad to submit what few remarks I have to make explanatory of this measure, in which every member of the Senate is interested, this morning, if it will suit my friend from West Virginia to give way.

Mr. BOREMAN. It is a month and a half since I reported a bill for the establishment of the Territory of Pembina, with a written report, to which I wish to call the attention of members of the Senate. I think that by the reading of this report it will be made manifest that this is a meritorious bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The merits of the bill are not subject to debate on this motion, the Senator is aware.

Mr. BOREMAN. I think it will not take long to consider it. I should like to have it considered at an early day. These people are crying out for some organization by which they can transact their business. As the bill, however, to which the Senator from Indiana proposes to speak is one in regard to pensions, I cannot well interpose; but I give notice that as soon as the Senator from Indiana is through, if he does not consume the morning hour, I shall move to consider this bill.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President——

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I submit to the Senator from Indiana whether it will not be well to wait until the expiration of the morning hour, and let us go on with the Calendar for a short time.

Mr. PRATT. Does the Senator from Maryland understand what is the bill that I propose to take up and address some remarks to this morning?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. No, sir.

Mr. PRATT. It is a bill amendatory of the law of March, 1871, giving pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812. This is an important House bill.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I did not know the subject on which the Senator desired to make some remarks; but I only wished to suggest to the Senator whether it would not suit him to wait until the expiration of the morning hour?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The regular order will be insisted on after the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the bill?

Mr. PRATT. I will say to the Senator from Ohio I will not press action this morning, but I wish to address some remarks to the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF WAR OF 1812.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, accordingly proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2190) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty.

Mr. PRATT. I ask that the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the act granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812, approved February 14, 1871, be amended so as to read as follows: That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the names of the surviving officers and enlisted and drafted men, including militia and volunteers of the military and naval service of the United States, who served in the war with Great Britain of 1812 and were honorably discharged, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted and drafted men: Provided, That such widows shall have been married prior to the year 1850 to an officer or enlisted or drafted man who served as aforesaid in said war.

SEC. 2. That this act shall not apply to any person who is receiving a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month or more, nor to any person receiving a pension less than eight dollars per month, except for the difference between the pension now received and eight dollars per month. Pensions under this act shall be at the rate of eight dollars per month, except as herein provided, when a person is receiving a pension of less than eight dollars per month, and shall be paid to the persons entitled thereto from and after the passage of this act for and during their natural lives. Provided, That widows pensioned under this act shall, if they became widows after the 14th day of February, 1871, be entitled to a pension only from the day when they became widows.

SEC. 3. That before the name of any person shall be placed upon the pension-rolls under this act proof shall be made, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, may prescribe, that the applicant is entitled to a pension under the provisions of this act; and any person who shall falsely take any oath required to be taken under the provisions of this act shall be guilty of perjury. And the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be stricken from the rolls the name of any persons when it shall appear, by proof satisfactory to him, that such names were put upon such pension-rolls by or through false or fraudulent representations as to the right of such persons to a pension under the provisions of this act. The loss or lack of a certificate of discharge shall not deprive the applicant of the benefit of this act, but other proof of the service performed and of an honorable discharge, if satisfactory, shall be deemed sufficient; and when there is no record evidence of service, the applicant may establish the same by the testimony of two persons who served in the same company or regiment: Provided, That when any person has been granted a land warrant under any act of Congress, for and on account of service in the war of 1812, such allowance shall be prima facie evidence of his service and honorable discharge, so as to entitle him if alive, or his widow if he be dead, to a pension; but such evidence shall not be conclusive, and may be rebutted by evidence that such land warrant was improperly granted.

SEC. 4. That all applications for pensions under the act to which this is an amendment, heretofore or which may hereafter be made, shall be considered and decided as though made under this act; and all laws now in force in regard to the manner of paying pensions and in reference to the punishment of frauds shall be applicable to all claims under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-rolls the names of all persons now surviving heretofore pensioned on account of service in the war of 1812 against Great Britian, and whose names were stricken from the rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government, or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862; and that the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution prohibiting payment by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression," approved March 2, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, so far modified as to authorize the payment of claimants under this act.

SEC. 6. That the surviving widow of any pensioner of the war of 1812, where the name of said pensioner was stricken from the pension-rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government, or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862, and where said pensioner died without his name being restored to the rolls, shall be entitled to the arrearages of pension due said pensioner at the time of his decease. In case there is no surviving widow, then such arrearages of pension shall, upon similar proof, go to the minor children of such pensioner.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, before proceeding to discuss the bill, I wish to occupy a few minutes in considering our pension system and its growth.

Pensions are the outgrowth of the calamities of war. I shall be understood, of course, as speaking of military pensions, and not of a class known as civil pensions, so common in Europe and which latterly have taken root in this country, in the provisions made for retired judges of the Federal courts.

A pension is an annual allowance of a sum of money to a person by government in consideration of past services, civil or military. This is its most general signification. But in this country the term is used to describe the allowance made for services of a mititary or naval character—the latter being known as naval pensions. They are bestowed by acts of Congress, first, upon such officers, soldiers, and sailors as have been disabled in the service of the country and in the line of duty by wounds, injuries, or disabilities incurrred, rendering them less capable to earn a livelihood by manual labor, and these are called invalid pensions. These allowances are graduated by two principles—the rank of the soldier and the extent of the disability. The maximum of the allowance is for a total disability, and for a partial one the rate is scaled to accord with the extent of the incapacity, running down as low as two dollars per month. Under the head of "invalid pensioners" are included those having what is known as specific permanent disabilities, comprehending those who have lost their hearing, or eyesight, or one or more limbs, where the bodily harm is not only permanent, but of that serious character as to render them almost wholly dependent for subsistence upon the justice and humane sentiments of the country.

The second class of pensions is known as "widows and orphans' pensions," and these are given, where the soldier falls in battle or dies of wounds or injuries received in the line of his duty, to his widow and minor children, and sometimes to his dependent parents, brothers, and sisters. This class is much larger numerically than the invalid pensioners, and a much larger sum of money is required annually to pay them.

Pensions, as the term is commonly used, do not necessarily depend upon previous contract, but are bestowed often from sentiments of gratitude and in recognition of the meritorious claims of those who in early life served their country and in old age are in indigent circumstances. Examples of this are found in our legislation in behalf of the soldiers of the revolutionary war and that of 1812 and their widows. These are more properly bounties or gratuities than pensions.

Our pension system dates back to the gloomy days of the Revolution, when the Colonies had recently combined together in resisting the encroachments of Parliament and the Crown. It originated in the resolutions of the Continental Congress of August 26, 1776, and April 23, 1782, the first one adopted in the next month after the Declaration of Independence. It has expanded wonderfully since that time in the liberality of its provisions and the philosophic distribution of its compensations. Then, as now, officers and soldiers of the Army, and officers, seamen, and marines of vessels of war, were included; but at first pensions were allowed for disabilities only incurred in the service, and no provision was made in the earlier laws for widows or other dependents in case of death in the service. Then the pension was limited to one-half the monthly pay, and applications were to be made to the legislative bodies of the several States where the applicants resided, which were to determine the rate, when the disability was not total.

By the resolution of 1782 the pension was restricted to five dollars per month.

Again, in 1790 it was affirmed that the pensions of officers should not exceed half-pay and those of privates five dollars per month.

In 1792 these pensions were conferred for life or during disability, and for the first time their payment was assumed by the United States; the States up to that time having paid them. The principle was then established, which has been continued ever since, that the right to a pension was not the subject of pledge, assignment, or transfer.

The act of 1795 established the principle that pensions should commence at the time of the completion of the testimony.

On April 10, 1806, Congress passed an act which consolidated and amended all previous pension laws, and restricted the highest pension to the half-pay of a lieutenant-colonel, and provided for an increase of those pensioned at lower rates to such sums as should be found just and proper by the testimony adduced. All previous pension laws were repealed.

This act provided for an invalid list. The evidence was to be taken before the district judge; the nature and extent of the disability were to be clearly pointed out, and how far it prevented the claimant from obtaining his subsistence. The judge transmitted a list of the claims, together with the evidence and a statement of the time it was closed, to the Secretary of War, and this officer forwarded a list of the cases and the evidence to Congress, with such remarks as he thought proper to enable this body to determine whether the claimants should be placed on the pension-roll. Both the pension and the increase were to commence on the day the claimant completed his testimony.

This law also authorized the transfer to the pension-roll of the United States of all persons who at that time remained on the pension-lists of any of the States, and who were placed there in consequence of disability occasioned by wounds received during the revolutionary war, whether they had served on the land or the sea in the forces of the United States or of any particular State; in the regular corps or in the militia or as volunteers.

It was not until the act of March 3, 1819, that Congress was relieved of the duty of examining the testimony, and power was conferred on the Secretary of War to adjudicate pension claims without making a report to Congress.

After 1806 no further pension legislation was had until the years 1812 and 1813, when the soldiers of the war then waging with Great Britain were put upon the footing of the soldiers of the Revolution.

The act of 1816 laid the foundation of the present system of classification. It increased the rates of pensions to full pay, as follows: First lieutenants to $17; second lieutenants to $15; third lieutenants to $14; ensigns to $13; non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates to $8 per month, leaving the pensions of officers of higher rank as they were before, at half-pay.

I pass to the act of 1818, which inaugurates a new principle; which has, however, entirely dropped out of our later legislation. It provided for all who had served for nine months or more in the war of the Revolution, whether in the Army or Navy, and who should become indigent, a pension of $20 per month to a commissioned officer, and for a lower grade a pension of $8 per month, during life. This pension was enlarged to full pay to officers and soldiers of the Continental Line by the act of 1828.

I now come to the act of May 1, 1820, which continued the rule of 1818 and provided the machinery for carrying it out. Under this law every pensioner then on the list, and every one who should apply in the future to be placed on it, was required to make a schedule of his property, verified by his oath, showing what it consisted of and its value; and after the 20th day of May, in that year, the Secretary of War could strike from the list all persons who were not in such indigent circumstances as to require assistance from their country. The pensions thus bestowed by the acts of 1818 and 1820 were not given for disabilities, but as gratuities, to mark the nation's gratitude toward the soldiers of the Revolution.

In the year 1843 the Pension Bureau, as it now exists, was established and the office of Commissioner of Pensions was created, and he was invested with the double power of administering the pension laws and those which granted military bounty lands.

Having now traced the outlines of our invalid-pension system down to the war of the rebellion, I go back to the early days of the Republic, to glance rapidly at the other branch of that system; that which relates to the soldier's death from wounds or injuries received while in the service and in the line of his duty, and which determines the class of dependents on the soldier entitled to care from the State.

All men would readily agree that if the soldier left a widow and orphan children, these should be objects of solicitude and parental care to an enlightened and humane state; and so they ever have been in every modification of the laws relating to pensions. For nearly five years had the war of the Revolution raged before Congress took measures to relieve the widows and orphans which war, exposure, and hardship had been constantly multiplying. It was on August 24, 1780, that the first resolution was adopted on the subject, and this gave the half-pay pension for seven years to the widows of officers who had died or might thereafter die in the service, and to their orphans if no widow had survived, or she had died or remarried.

The act of January 11, 1812, provided for the widow and children of commissioned officers only, and the relief granted was limited to cases of death by reason of wounds in actual service. The pension allowed was half the monthly pay to which the deceased officer was entitled at the time of his death, and expired in five years. No provision as yet was made for the widow or children of the non-commissioned officer and private. Nor indeed does any provision beyond bounty land seem to have been made for widows and orphans of private soldiers until the act of April 16, 1816, was passed, which gave them, in lieu of the land and because of the husband's or father's death in battle or of wounds received while in service in the then recent war, half of the monthly pay he was receiving at the time of his death; and this, called a military pension, was to be paid for the term of five years. This seems to have been the very first provision made by law for pensioning widows and children of non-commissioned officers and privates. It was meager in amount and limited to a short term. It is proper to say, however, that Congress from time to time renewed the pensions as the terms were about expiring, and extended the beneficent provision to the widows and children of those who performed service in the Navy.

When the war with Mexico came, Congress hastened to extend to volunteers to be received into the service of the United States, who should be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, the same benefits which had before been conferred on persons wounded in the service, and by the subsequent act of July 21, 1848, made ample provision for the widows and orphans of soldiers engaged in that war.

But it would be a tedious and, at this day, an unprofitable service to bring in review all the legislation on this subject. I have given but a meager outline. Nor would it be pertinent to review the pension legislation during the recent rebellion and since its termination, which, embracing nine different enactments, was consolidated in the act of March 3, 1873, and is familiar to the Senate and the country. What is more pertinent to the occasion is a brief allusion to the law of February 14, 1871, which directed the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll certain officers and soldiers who served in the war of 1812, but had been in no manner disabled in the service, and to whom what was given was in the nature of a gratuity, though called a pension. Its benefits were limited to those who had served sixty days in the military or naval service and had been honorably discharged, or who, not having served that term, had been personally named in any resolution of Congress for any specific service in the war, and excluded all such as had adhered during the rebellion to the cause of the enemies of the Government. It included also such widows of deceased officers and soldiers as had married prior to the treaty of peace which terminated the war, and who had not remarried. The pension given was a uniform one of eight dollars per month, but was forbidden when the soldier or widow was drawing one already at that rate.

Congress was slow to recognize the claims of the soldiers of that war, who based them upon no pretense of injury received or of promise made, but simply on their advanced age, their poverty, and the meritorious services rendered the country in their youth. The law was carefully worded and was intended to be a finality. Bounty land, one hundred and sixty acres to each, had already been given to all who had served fourteen days in the war and to their surviving widows.

But the law of 1871, while it gratified those who were recipients of its benefits, caused great dissatisfaction to those it did not reach, and ever since Congress has been importuned to reopen the subject and enlarge the scope of the law. The public sentiment has found expression in the bill which the House of Representatives has sent the Senate for its concurrence, and which I have this morning, as the organ of the Committee on Pensions, reported back without amendment for action in this body.

This bill amends the act of February 14, 1871, so as to give pensions at the rate of eight dollars per month to all the surviving officers and enlisted and drafted men who served in the war with Great Britain of 1812 and were honorably discharged, and to the surviving widows of such officers and men, provided that the widows were married to them before the year 1850.

It differs from the act which it amends in two particulars. By the original law the pension was allowed only to such as had served sixty days, or who not having served that length of time had been personally named in some resolution of Congress. It provided for such widows only as had been married prior to the treaty of peace which terminated the war.

There is still another particular in which the bill differs from the law of 1871. That excluded from pensions those who during the late rebellion adhered to the cause of the enemies of the Government, giving them aid and comfort, or who exercised the functions of any office in the confederate government.

This bill takes no account of the sentiments or action of the soldier during the rebellion and removes the barrier of sixty days and pensions all without respect to the period of service. This section will entitle all who take under it to pensions on the 14th of February, 1871. It places all now excluded upon an equal footing with those admitted under the old law. This is the substance of the first section.

The next section, in everything except the proviso commencing at line 10, simply re-enacts the old law. The proviso, it will be observed, relates to widows, and such widows as were not entitled under the original law, and enacts that where they have become such since February 14, 1871, their pensions shall commence from the date of widowhood. Where they were widows before that date, their pensions will date from the passage of the law of 1871.

There are two features in the third section deserving attention. The first is, that the loss or lack of a certificate of discharge shall not bar the applicant for a pension, but secondary proof of the service performed and of an honorable discharge, if satisfactory, shall be deemed sufficient. Where there is no record evidence of service, the fact of the service may be established by two witnesses who served in the same company or regiment. There is another rule of evidence laid down, and that is that when the soldier has received a land warrant for his services in the war of 1812, the allowance of the warrant shall be prima facie but not conclusive evidence of service and honorable discharge to the soldier in his application for pension, and to his widow in case of his death.

There is a very beneficial provision in the fourth section to which I call the attention of the Senate. A great many applications for pension under the law of 1871 have been rejected at the Pension Bureau for want of sufficient proof of service, or of service for sixty days. The collection of these proofs has been attended with labor and expense. This section requires that these applications shall be considered and decided as though made under the present act; and this of course gives the applicants the benefit of all the proof filed.

The next section will probably lead to debate. Congress passed an act on the 4th day of February, 1862, requiring the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as had taken up arms against the Government or who had in any manner encouraged the rebels. And again on the 7th day of March, 1867, a joint resolution was passed prohibiting payment by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression. A great many soldiers who had served in the war of 1812, and were drawing pensions at the beginning of the rebellion, were dropped from the rolls on the passage of this act in 1862. This bill restores such and none others. In other words, it removes the disabilities of the soldiers of that war, so as to put them upon equal footing with those who adhered to the Government. The effect of this restoration will be to put them upon the same footing as though they had never been dropped, and to take up their pensions from the time they were discontinued.

The next and last section extends this benefit to the widow of the soldier whose name was dropped from the rolls, and entitles her to the arrearages of pension due her husband at the time of his death. Should there be such a case as no surviving widow, but minor children of the pensioner, these arrears go to them.

I have thus given a faithful abstract of the bill. It has been reported to the Senate as it came from the House without a single amendment, though I shall take occasion to point out two objections urged by myself, and ask the Senate to modify the bill so as to meet them.

Before doing that, however, I ask the attention of the Senate to the reasons which governed the majority of the committee in agreeing to report this bill favorably in the precise form it came from the House of Representatives.

The war with Great Britain was declared June 18, 1812, and peace was made on the 17th day of February, 1815. It is therefore nearly sixty years since the war was concluded; it will be just sixty on the 17th day of next February. The youth of twenty then, is the old man of eighty now. The Commissioner of Pensions estimates the average age of the survivors to be eighty-one or about that. Every one can verify this opinion by his knowledge of such of these veterans as he happens to know. A great many letters come addressed to the committee from these old soldiers and they generally speak of their age as eighty and upward.

There is another fact not to be lost sight of, which is, that they are generally poor, at least if we may believe their own account. Most of them base their claim upon that fact, and the further one, that they are too old to earn their subsistence by labor. We may readily believe this to be true. Besides these grounds, based on their needs, they appeal to the gratitude of the nation, now populous, wealthy, and powerful, to mark their respect by a substantial token.

The law of 1871 has given rise to bitter complaint on the part of all not comprehended within its benefits. Especially does this complaint come from those who served thirty days and upward. They ask, Why allow those who served sixty days and not allow those who served thirty, forty, or fifty? Several cases have been before the committee where the service was fifty-seven, fifty-eight, and fifty-nine days. Shall a single day separate us, say they, into two classes; the one to be honored by this mark of the nation's gratitude—an honorable pension—the other to be ignored? On what principle of justice or equity, they demand, do you exalt the one and pay no heed to the other?

Again they urge: Though we served less than sixty days, yet in point of merit, in point of actual hardship endured and valuable services rendered, we should be preferred to many whose service, though nominally sixty days, was far less hazardous than ours, and of less benefit to the country. They put the case in this way: We were out less than sixty days, true, but in that time we fought the battle of Plattsburgh, while our sixty-day comrades, now quietly enjoying a pension, never smelt gunpowder at all.

Again they urge: When Congress gave bounty land to the soldiers of the war of 1812, all men were included who served fourteen days, and why should the term of service be extended from fourteen to sixty days, to give the same soldiers a title to pension?

Again say they: The country did not strictly owe pensions to any of the survivors of the war of 1812 comprehended in the law of 1871. Those entitled to pensions by reasons of wounds or injuries had long since been pensioned, and the widows of those who fell in battle, or died in consequence of injuries or disabilities incurred, were already provided for under the general pension laws. It was a misnomer, therefore, they urge, to call that a pension which was given to soldiers never disabled in the service; it was an abuse of terms to call that a pension which was given to the widow, when her husband died a natural death, in no way hastened by his short service in the war.

It must be admitted, sir, there is much force in this objection, the point of which is this: pensions are given because of promises by the nation to the soldier. They are inducements to enlisting in the hazardous service of war. They were given to all such soldiers of the war of 1812 as they had been promised to. What the act of 1871 gave was not a pension, but a bounty. The land given to the same soldiers was called bounty land. Congress had never promised it to induce enlistments. Congress had never promised to take care, in their old age, of such soldiers as had passed through the war unhurt. "Now, then," say the slighted class—the men who served less than sixty days—"you owed no debt to those who served sixty days that you did not owe to those who served only thirty, and that debt was one of gratitude only, and you should not apportion the gratitude of the nation by any such narrow principle as that established by the existing law. It is not so much the mere length of time the citizen served his country, as the fact that he did serve it, that begets the gratitude. Now, since the bounty comes of gratitude, and is the form of its expression, it should not be circumscribed by a rule which wholly ignores a part of the Army equal in all points of merit to the favored class except in the mere fact that their term of service was less."

Mr. President, I have tried to present the argument. The majority of the committee thought it possessed so much force that it would be invidious to maintain any distinction founded on the mere length of service, now that the career of all is drawing so rapidly to a close. There is not a soldier left who has not passed the allotted term of three-score years and ten. Like the withered leaves of November they are rapidly falling, and in a few years more not one will be left of the men who contributed a second time to achieve our independence of Great Britain.

The war which terminated in the brilliant battle of New Orleans brought around a peace with that great power which, though at times seriously threatened, has continued unbroken for sixty years.

Speaking for myself, I greatly doubt the policy of pensioning those who served less than fourteen days. The law of 1855, which granted bounty land to all soldiers and sailors who had served in any of the wars since 1790, adopted that term of service. If there was a reason for just that number of days then, it exists with as much force now.

I doubt still more the policy which pensions all such surviving widows as were married before the year 1850. It has not been seriously claimed by anybody, that I am aware of, that the time of the marriage should be extended beyond the year 1825. That limit would include all who married soldiers during the ten years which succeeded the close of the war. Indeed, on principle, it is hard to understand why the bounty of the nation should be extended to any widows except those who became partners of the soldiers before or during the war. When the war ended, those who participated in it were emancipated from their enlistments and returned to their citizen duties in nowise disqualified to enter into the competitions of industry. Indeed, most of them had served but short periods; not sufficiently long to disturb their home occupations. What claim in reason, then, have their widows to be distinguished from other women who happen to survive their husbands? Of course I am speaking now of the widows of soldiers who were not disabled in the service from making a livelihood. As to those who were disabled, the country has long since indemnified both them and their widows. I repeat, what is given by this bill is a bounty, and a bounty only; and the point I make is that the women who married soldiers after their release from the army, and who had passed unscathed through the war, can advance no solid reason why the country should pension them any more than it should pension all other widows. But should Congress do this, ten years is a limit long enough to embrace all who should become beneficiaries as having married the soldier within that time. I hope, therefore, the bill will be amended in the Senate, so that if the law of 1871 is amended in respect to the widows at all, it will not be made to comprehend those who married later than 1825.

The Senate will be anxious to know how this change in the law will affect our pension-list.

Probably no nation has so large a pension-roll as ours. The country has paid to its soldiers and sailors $311,000,000 since the year 1791. There were 289,715 soldiers of all degrees of service in the war of the Revolution, and of these 57,623 were pensioned. Then followed the Indian wars of 1794 and 1811, the war with Great Britain, the Seminole and Black Hawk wars, the disturbances in the Cherokee and Creek countries in 1836–'37, the Florida war from 1836 to 1842, the war with Mexico, the New York frontier disturbances in 1838–'39, the Aroostook disturbances, and lastly the war of the rebellion; and pensions have been granted on account of all these wars. The total number of pensioners of all classes upon our rolls on the 30th day of June last was 238,411, and the sum paid to the pensioners that year was $26,259,284.43, but the actual cost to the country of the pension system for that year was $29,185,289.62. But of this sum nearly three millions was paid to pension agents and examining surgeons and for expenses of pension agencies and commutations for artificial limbs. It will hardly surprise any one that our roll should be so large when it is remembered that the number of soldiers engaged in the war of the rebellion was 2,688,523.

I gave a moment since the amount of pensions paid since 1791. Besides pensions, Congress has voted seventy million acres bounty lands to the soldiers in the different wars, not including the rebellion; a quantity three and one-half times greater than the area of Indiana, and nearly double that of the State of Illinois. Surely no country was ever more liberal to its soldiery.

In his report for 1872 the Commissioner of Pensions furnishes a statement of the number of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the war of 1812. The total number was 527,654. These were divided as follows:

Those who served twelve months or more	63,179
Number of militia serving six months or more	66,325
Number of militia serving three months or more	125,643
Number of militia serving one month or more	125,307
Number of militia serving less than one month	147,200
Total	527,654

It will be seen that more than one-third of the whole number called out served less than one month.

When the Commissioner made his report in November 1, 1872, one year and nine months after the act of February 14, 1871, had passed, giving pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, he reported that he had received claims under the law from 27,833 survivors and from 9,430 widows.

Of the survivors admitted to pensions up to November 1, 1872, there were 19,262, and of widows 4,198—in all 23,460; and 6,294 claims from survivors and widows had been rejected. One half of the rejections, namely, 3,129, proceeded from insufficient service, and of course all such rejections will be let in under the present bill.

When in November last the Commissioner submitted his annual report, there were then on the pension-rolls of—

Survivors of the war of 1812	18,266
Widows of	5,053
Total	23,319

In this report he furnishes tables of the "war of 1812 roll" for June 30, 1872, and June 30, 1873; and on the first roll the soldiers drawing pensions are put down at 17,100; the widows at 3,027; making a total of 20,127. On the roll for the year ending June 30, 1873, the survivors number 18,266; the widows 5,053; making a total of 23,319; showing an increase in the number of persons of 3,192.

Notwithstanding this addition of 3,192 of survivors and widows to the pension-roll during the last fiscal year, there had been losses by death of 2,036 soldiers and 222 widows.

Thus, sir, it will be seen that under the law of 1871, which admitted only such soldiers as had served sixty days and such widows only as had married before the conclusion of peace, we have on the pension-roll over twenty-three thousand, and the annual amount of pension-money to which they are entitled is about $2,250,000. Bearing in mind that probably one-half of the number that served in the Army served less than sixty days, I think it fair to infer that the number of survivors under the present bill will reach eleven thousand, which added to those now admitted as pensioners will make a total of nearly thirty thousand survivors, costing annually $3,000,000. If under the existing law there are over five thousand widows who were married before the treaty of peace, the Senate can form its own judgment as to the number who will be entitled to pensions if the limit of marriage is extended from 1815 to 1850—a period of thirty-five years—so as to include all widows who were married in that long period. I do not hazard any opinion of my own as to what the number will be. If they stood upon a similar footing of merit with those now pensioned, of course we should not stop to calculate the cost; but in my judgment they do not. I think it safe, however, to say that if it costs the country now $2,250,000 to carry into effect the law of 1871, it will require an appropriation of six millions to meet the demands of the present bill, exclusive of arrears. Of course this list will rapidly diminish. But I prefer submitting the estimates of the Pension Office to any expression of opinion of my own, and I send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the Acting Commissioner and ask that it may be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 29, 1874.

SIR: In reply to your inquiries of this date I have the honor to answer as follows:

First. At what percentage per annum do the survivors of the war of 1812 on the roll die?

It appears from our records that during the year ending June 30, 1872, of 17,100 survivors on the roll, 604 deaths were reported, or 3.5 per cent. During the year ending 1873, of 18,266 on the roll, 2,036 deaths were reported, or 11.1 per cent.

Of the widows, out of 3,027 pensioned to June 30, 1872, 122 deaths were reported, or 4 per cent. In 1873, of 5,053 on the roll, 222 deaths, or 4.4 per cent., were reported.

It is necessary to add that this statement does not include all those of either class who died during those periods. Deaths are only reported to the office when allowances are claimed. We estimate the actual loss to the roll at about 10 per cent. per annum, though the names may remain upon the record until three years from the date of last payment, when they will be dropped by operation of law.

Second. How does the percentage of deaths increase as they get older?

From the foregoing it will appear that we are unable to give reliable information upon this point.

Third. If all the soldiers of that war (1812) should be pensioned, what would be the probable addition to the list?

Basing the estimate upon our experience under the act of February 14, 1871, I find that 51,555 soldiers of the war of 1812 would have been entitled at the date of its passage for one day's service. Deducting therefrom 25 per cent. for those since deceased, 12,889, and 16¼ per cent. as an allowance for those who, from various causes, will fail to apply, and those who will be unable to prove their claims, 6,445, and I conclude that 32,221 soldiers would be added to the list, an excess of 10,836 over the present roll.

Fourth. If widows who married before 1825 were admitted, how many would be added to the list?

Under date of January 15, 1873, I had the honor to inform you that in the opinion of this office 16,000 widows would become entitled by the extension of the limitation as to marriage down to 1825, the term of service remaining at sixty days. Proper deductions from those figures would be 10 per cent. for deaths, 1,600, and 20 per cent. for incomplete claims, 2,880, leaving 11,520 as the number who would probably become pensioners.

Fifth. If widows married before 1856 were admitted to the pension-list, to what extent would it increase the present roll?

Without claiming a great degree of accuracy for this statement, I place the number at 28,000, assuming that one day's service is intended. At date of 1825 these soldiers had reached an age when most men have formed their domestic relations, and marriages subsequent to that time were principally remarriages.

Sixth. Taking the House bill (2190) as it is, what would probably be the amount of appropriation necessary to meet the increase?

Survivors to be added, 10,386, at $96 per year	$1,040,256
Widows to be added, 28,000, at $96 per year	2,688,000
Removal of disloyalty bar, 464, at $96 per year	44,640
Total	3,772,896
To pay arrearages, three years	11,318,688
Grand total	15,091,584

Upon the assumption that the claims will be adjusted immediately upon the passage of the act, this amount of appropriation would become necessary. But in fact their settlement would occupy several years, and the arrearages, to a large amount, become payable from future annual appropriations. As $400 would be required to meet the payment of each new claim admitted during the first fiscal year, if 20,000 claims are adjusted during that period—and with a proper amount of force this can be done—an immediate appropriation of about $8,000,000 will be required.

Seventh. How many pensioners of the war of 1812 are now admitted?

Survivors	21,385
Widows	6,076
Total	27,461

Eighth. What, since you made your last report, is the probable number of deaths of survivors and widows? Applying this question to pensioners, I am unable, without occupying more time than you have allowed me, to give an answer. If made, as I state, under your first question, the number reported to the office would vary materially from the correct number.

In view of your request for an immediate answer, the statement has been very hastily prepared, but is believed to be approximately correct.

Very respectfully,

JOS. LOCKEY,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. D. D. PRATT,
Chairman Committee on Pensions, United States Senate.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, in what I have said I do not want to be understood as grudging what is thus given to the soldiers and to their meritorious companions—the companions of their youth; far from it—but I do hesitate to give a bounty to those who married the soldier in his old age. This bill puts the widow who married the soldier at the age of fifty-five upon the same footing with her who wedded him in his youth and during the perils and privations of war. I can see an obvious justice in pensioning her who was left in sorrow and uncertainty while her husband was called out to face the enemy—left to look after the wants of her family during his absence—and her who married the soldier a quarter of a century after peace was restored.

There remains but one topic more upon which I wish to be indulged to say a few words, that provision in the bill which restores the soldiers dropped from the rolls. When the war of the rebellion occurred, forty-five years had passed since the treaty of peace with Great Britain. The soldier in the war of 1812 was sixty-five or seventy years old in 1862, when Congress ordered him to be dropped from the pension-roll. He was too old for active service, and his sympathies with the rebellion could do little good to the rebels, or harm to the country. Besides, he was a disabled and not a sound man. He would not have been in the receipt of a pension but for the fact that he was an invalid. That was the name of the roll upon which his name was inscribed. His pension was a debt acknowledged by the nation to be due him. It was a debt of the most sacred character, and therefore the last to be repudiated. It was the indemnity which the nation was paying for a lost limb or broken health. The law of 1862 took effect upon him though he was a helpless cripple or stretched upon a bed of suffering. Too often, I am afraid, it took from him the means of getting his daily bread. Nothing but the necessities of war could have justified such an act, and it should have ceased its operations the moment the rebellion was suppressed. I can well understand why patriotic men should have given their sanction to an act which arrested a flow of money into the insurgent States which might have been employed to aid and continue the rebellion. But Congress did not attempt to confiscate their pensions; it simply suspended their payment. Now, sir, it is nine years since the rebellion was at an end; we have condoned the officers and men who were engaged in it, and removed their civil and political disabilities; and yet we have failed to extend any measure of grace to these old soldiers who earned their humble pensions in fighting under the flag of the Union.

Let us hasten to render them this act of tardy justice. Let us cause their dim eyes to look once more with pride and love upon that flag as the symbol not only of the nation's unity and greatness, but of its justice and truth.

AMERICAN REGISTER TO SHIP SUFFOLK.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday, being the civil-rights bill, is now before the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, there is on the Calendar Senate bill No. 766, reported from the Committee on Commerce. The whole purpose of the bill is to permit a register to be issued to the steamship Suffolk, which has been purchased by the International Ocean Telegraph Company, and is designed for laying ocean cables, having been adapted to that use at Baltimore. As I suppose there will be no objection to it, I ask the Senate to take it up and put it on its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent to lay aside the pending order informally that the Senate may consider the bill indicated by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 766) to grant an American register to the steamship Suffolk and to change the name of said steamship to that of Professor Morse was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXPORTATION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I appeal to the Senator from Vermont, and ask to be allowed to call up a bill, to which I think there will be no objection, in regard to the exportation of spirits in bond, which, if it is to have any remedial effect, should pass now. It is a House bill and has been carefully considered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not charge of the regular order; the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from New Jersey will hear the bill read and then objects to it, I will not ask that it be taken up to-day. I am pressed by the Department to call it up. My friend from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] reported it, and I call it up in his absence.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits, and amendatory of the acts in relation thereto.

The bill proposes to further amend section 55 of the act of July 20, 1868, as amended by the act of June 6, 1872, and by the act of March 3, 1873, by striking out the words "such bonds," where they first occur in the section, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "a transportation bond;" by inserting in the second proviso of the section, after the word "given" and before the word "for," the words "to the collector of the port," and after the words "bill of lading" and before the word "or," the words "or any other port without the jurisdiction of the United States;" by striking out of the section the word "twenty-five" before the word "cents," and inserting the word "ten" in lieu thereof; by inserting after the word "practicable" the words "on arrival of the spirits at the port of export, the exporter or owner at that port shall immediately notify the collector of the port of the fact, setting forth his intention to export the same, and the name of the vessel upon which the same are to be laden, and the port to which they are intended to be exported. He shall, after the quantity of spirits has been determined by the gauger and inspector, file with the collector of the port an export entry and an affidavit. He shall also give bond to the United States, with at least two sureties, satisfactory to the collector of customs, conditioned that the principal named in said bond will export the spirits as specified in said entry to the port designated in said entry, or to any other port without the jurisdiction of the United States;" by inserting, after the words "upon which the tax has been paid," the words "and upon the lading of such spirits, the collector of the port, after proper bonds for the exportation of the same have been completed by the exporter or owner at the port of shipment thereof, shall transmit to the collector of internal revenue of the district from which the said spirits were withdrawn for exportation, a clearance certificate and a detailed report of the gauger, which report shall show the capacity of each cask in wine gallons and the contents thereof in wine gallons, proof gallons, and taxable gallons. Upon the receipt of the certificate and report, and upon payment of tax on deficiency, if any, in excess of 2 per cent. of the number of gallons of spirits named in the entry of withdrawal, the collector of internal revenue shall cancel the transportation bond; and, further, that the allowance of 2 per cent. for deficiency shall apply to all transportation bonds now outstanding made previous to the passage of the act, in accordance with the regulations under the act of July 20, 1868, as amended by the act of June 6, 1872."

The second section proposes to amend section 1 of the act of May 27, 1872, by inserting after the words "United States," in the first paragraph of said section, the words "or in transit in bond for export;" and after the word "warehouse," the third time it occurs, and before the word "bond," the words "or transportation."

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was in lines 14, 15, and 16, of section 1, to strike out the words:

By striking out of said section the word "twenty-five" before the word "cents," and inserting the word "ten" in lieu thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines 42 and 43, after the words "if any," to strike out the words "in excess of 2 per cent. of the number of gallons of spirits named in the entry of withdrawal;" so as to read:

Upon the receipt of the certificate and report, and upon payment of tax on deficiency, if any, the collector of internal revenue shall cancel the transportation bond.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following words, commencing in line 45 of section 1:

And, further, that the allowance of 2 per cent. for deficiency shall apply to all transportation bonds now outstanding made previous to the passage of this act, in accordance with the regulations under the act of July 20, 1868, as amended by the act of June 6, 1872.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the second section of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. The frame of this bill is such as to make it difficult to understand, even as well as we might from a simple reading understand such a measure in other form, and without suggesting that it is not right, I wish the Senator from Iowa would explain to us briefly the changes that it will make in the law.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will do so. I will state in advance that this bill has the entire approval of the Internal Revenue Commissioner, who was before the committee, and we have also his letter, which is on file.

The two matters that are affected by this bill in the law as it now stands are these: In the first place it has been found that where an export bond was given by a distiller in the West and the spirits were sent to New York, it frequently occurred that he would have three or four or half a dozen shipments there, and he was required to give new security for each shipment, and there was difficulty in his obtaining sureties upon these different shipments. We therefore propose to change the law so that when a new bond shall be given in New York for the shipment from New York to the port of exportation, the bond given in the West shall be canceled, so that the person who is shipping from the West, instead of being incumbered by a number of bonds as he ships spirits, after the bond has been given in New York, may cancel the first bond and give the same sureties in subsequent shipments. That is one provision proposed to be changed by the bill.

Next, under the law as it stands now, they are required to make shipments to a particular port abroad, and we propose by this bill to allow them to export to a particular port or to such other port as they may see proper; that is to say they are not confined to a particular port when they start from New York, but they may have the bond in the alternative. That is for liquors shipped abroad and upon which there is a drawback, as the Senator understands.

There were other provisions in the bill with reference to spirits shipped upon bonded cars that allowed the shippers, if there was a destruction of liquors in transit to New York, to recover back what had been paid. That provision we have struck out of the bill entirely. There is also a provision with reference to 2 per cent leakage, and we have struck that out of the bill entirely; so that it now stands, as I remember, upon the two provisions that I have explained.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF GAS-WORKS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am informed that it will be more convenient perhaps to the Senate to take up to-day the gas bill, to which I referred in the morning hour, and act upon it now. I therefore move that all prior orders be postponed in order to take up Senate bill No. 733.

Mr. BOREMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Not so early. We can get through with this bill in half an hour probably.

Mr. BOREMAN. I think not; but I have no objection to wait half an hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) The Senator from West Virginia withdraws his motion; and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 733) regulating gas-works was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section provides that from and after the 30th of June, 1874, the illuminating power of the gas furnished by any gas-light company, person, or persons, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, shall be equal to sixteen candles by the Bunson photometer, using the English parliamentary standard argand burner, having fifteen holes and a seven-inch chimney, consuming five cubic feet of gas per hour, and such gas shall not contain more than twenty grains of sulphur in any form in one hundred cubic feet, nor more than five grains of ammonia in any form in one hundred cubic feet. When the illuminating gas supplied by any company, person, or persons in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, shall at any one time be of less illuminating power or of less purity than according to this standard, it shall be so reported by the inspector of gas and meters to the company, person, or persons supplying the same, who shall be subject to a penalty of $100, to be recovered before the proper tribunal and paid into the treasury of the city of Washington for each and every day during which such violation shall continue; but if it shall appear that such deviation from the standard could not have been prevented by ordinary care and prudence, but was occasioned by some unavoidable cause, the penalty shall not be enforced.

The second section provides that a suitable and impartial person, competent as a chemist, who is not a stockholder or employé in any gas-works, shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to be designated and known as inspector of gas and meters, whose compensation shall be a salary of $2,000 per annum, and whose duties shall be to test and determine the illuminating power and purity of the gas furnished by any company, person, or persons in the District of Columbia; and to test, prove, and seal all meters that may be hereafter used by them. A suitable person, who shall be a gas-fitter by trade, is to be appointed by the President, on the recommendation of the inspector of gas and meters, as an assistant inspector, at a salary of $1,000 per annum, who shall assist in the duties specified under the direction of the inspector of gas and meters.

Section 3 requires that a laboratory shall be provided and fitted up by the Washington Gas-light Company, subject to the approval of the inspector, in the central part of the city of Washington, at a distance, as near as may be, of two thousand —— from any gas-works, and furnished with suitable apparatus for the transaction of the business of the inspector and assistant inspector, for which it is intended, and the laboratory shall be kept open on all business days between the hours of eight o'clock in the forenoon and five o'clock in the afternoon.

Section 4 permits the company, person, or persons furnishing the gas, if they see fit, to be on each occasion of the testing of the gas by the inspector or assistant inspector represented by some officer, but such officer shall not interfere in the testing.

The fifth section requires daily inspections, Sundays excepted, shall be made between the hours of five and eleven o'clock in the afternoon, and a record kept of each inspection, giving the illuminating power and purity, which shall be open to the public, and a copy of the daily inspection shall be furnished the following day to the company, person, or persons furnishing the gas, Saturday's inspection to be furnished on Monday, and a full report for the month to be furnished, upon request, to any daily papers printed in the city of Washington on the day of their publication, next after the 24th day of each month, to include each day's test from the date of previous publication, and giving the average illuminating power for the month.

Section 6 provides that all bills for gas furnished by any company, person, or persons shall state the average illuminating power for the month; and if the same shall fall below sixteen candles, as prescribed in the first section, the amount of the bill shall be reduced pro rata.

Section 7 requires that in testing meters the inspector or assistant inspector shall ascertain whether the meter is of proper construction, and requires only the pressure of a column of water indicated by the water-gauge, commonly used for such tests, of one-fourth of an inch high to work it, and whether it works regularly and correctly, and registers exactly the amount of gas passing through it, first, at the rate the meter is marked to supply; secondly, at one-third its rate; thirdly, at twice its rate. The standard foot shall be one cubic foot, containing 62.321 pounds, avoirdupois weight, of distilled water at the temperature of 62° Fahrenheit, and with a barometrical pressure of thirty inches; and meters registering within 2 per cent. either way of the exact number of such feet passing through them at the first-named rate, and within 3 per cent. at the second and third rates, and no others shall be deemed accurate and be stamped by the inspector. The inspector shall keep at the laboratory a correct record of all meters inspected by him, with their proof at the time of inspection, which record shall be open at all times to the public for any reasonable examination by any company, person, or persons having any interest therein.

It is provided by the eighth section that any gas-meters now in use shall be proved and tested on the written request of the consumer of gas on whose premises it may be, and in his presence, if he requires, upon the payment in advance to the inspector or assistant inspector of fifty cents for each and every meter inspected, proved, and sealed; and if any such meter, on being tested, shall be found to register inaccurately to the injury of the consumer to an extent exceeding 2 per cent., the fee of fifty cents shall be returned to the person applying for the inspection and be paid to the inspector by the company, person, or persons supplying the gas; and every such meter shall be considered correct, and sealed accordingly, which shall register quantities varying from the true standard measure of gas of not more than 2 per cent., and a record shall be kept of the same and of all fees so collected. All meters hereafter used by any gas company, person, or persons shall be first inspected, proved, and sealed at the laboratory provided for by the act; and for such inspection, proving, and sealing the company, in the first instance, and thereafter the company, person, or persons applying to have the meter inspected, shall pay fifty cents for each meter, a record of which shall be kept and of the fees so collected; and all fees shall be applied to the payment of the expenses for maintaining and keeping in good order and repair the laboratory and apparatus.

Section 9 provides that each company, person, or persons manufacturing illuminating gas in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, shall, when required, in writing, by the inspector of gas and meters, bring to the laboratory any meter that may have been required to be inspected, proved, and sealed, and to return the same to its proper place after such inspection; and that it shall not be lawful for any other party or person to remove and return meters.

Section 10 provides that the inspector and assistant inspector of gas and meters shall each give bonds to the extent of double his annual salary, and shall each take an oath or affirmation, before some officer legally qualified to administer the same, that he will faithfully, diligently, and impartially discharge the duties of his office.

By the eleventh section the Washington Gas-light Company is authorized hereafter to charge and receive for coal-gas furnished to and paid for by the Government of the United States, at the rate of $2.50 per thousand cubic feet; and when furnished and paid for by other parties, or by the inhabitants of the city of Washington, at the rate of $2.75 per thousand cubic feet; but if the party or inhabitants so furnished shall pay monthly any bill within seven days after the same shall have been presented, the party shall be entitled to a discount upon the amount of such bill at the rate of twenty-five cents per thousand cubic feet. All laws authorizing any higher rates are repealed.

Section 12 requires the Washington Gas-light Company to furnish illuminating gas to the government of the District of Columbia within the distance of fifty yards from any of their mains, on the same terms as to the Government of the United States, and in case of the non-payment of any quarterly bills by the District beyond the period of ten days from the time of presentation, the company shall be entitled to demand and receive interest thereon from date until paid. The company shall light, extinguish, keep clean, and repair the Washington City street lamps at the uniform price of forty dollars for each lamp per annum, to burn two thousand hours per annum, with a six-foot burner on each lamp, subject to any regulation that may be prescribed by the city authorities as to the time of lighting and extinguishing the same, and any extra number of hours to be charged and paid for at the same rate; and the city of Washington is to furnish, when necessary, new lanterns to replace old ones, and to furnish and pay for the reasonable expense of erecting new lamp-posts to replace such as are old, damaged, and unfit for use.

Section 13 provides if any person or persons supplied with gas neglect or refuse to pay the amount due for the same, the company may stop the gas from entering the premises of such person or persons. In no case shall the officers, servants, or workmen of a company remove a meter from premises supplied by the company, unless by consent of the consumer, without first giving forty-eight hours' notice in writing by leaving the same at the premises of the consumer; and the removal shall take place only between the hours of eight o'clock in the forenoon and two o'clock in the afternoon.

Section 14 reserves to Congress at any time the right hereafter to alter, amend, or repeal the act.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If Senators have read the report of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds there is hardly any occasion for making any remarks upon the bill. As the company have hitherto existed, they have nearly always had the price of gas regulated by Congress. It has sometimes been at about the same rate, or once at $2.52 net instead of $2.50, the price proposed in this bill; it has sometimes been as high as four dollars per thousand feet. Upon a comparison with other cities where the price of coal is nearly the same as it is here, it is thought to be just and fair to the company that they should furnish the gas for $2.50 per thousand feet for the Government and the people alike.

I may say here that the Washington Gas-light Company is a very prosperous one. It was incorporated with a small capital, and gradually increased to half a million dollars. In 1866 it was doubled, or raised to a million dollars, and there was subsequently added a provision by which the capital was increased by $150,000 to $200,000 more; and yet the stockholders of the company have never contributed a dollar beyond the first original stock of half a million dollars, save a small percentage on this $150,000 additional, of which they do not seem to have had any need, as they have not called for it; and at the present time their surplus is $700,000, or over that; and they have been paying 10 per cent. dividends, not only on the amount of money actually invested, the half million dollars, but on twice that sum since 1866.

Besides this there has been a general complaint, and I believe made by members of Congress as much as by any other parties, that the quality of gas here was entirely uncertain and frequently very inferior. There has been no regular inspection of the gas for many years. There is no legal authority by which the quality of gas sold shall be measured. Therefore a system of inspection seems to be indispensable, almost as indispensable as the measure of a bushel of grain or a gallon of spirits. The committee have therefore reported this bill fixing the price of gas, and providing also the machinery for a proper inspection. I should add that the company do not object to the inspection proposed. I do not think that any one who has examined the subject will think that we have placed the price too low, and I trust there will be no attempt to place it at a lower figure, as we should be entirely just to the company. I ask now to be allowed to make some verbal amendments to the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont how the price fixed in this bill compares with that of other cities?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator will read the report, he will see a statement of the prices of gas furnished throughout the whole country, and, as the committee have said in their report, they are almost universally extravagant prices. There is no kind of doubt but that gas can be furnished at a much less rate than is usually charged throughout the whole country, or certainly in all regions of the country not remote to the gas-coal fields.

The price of gas in Boston is $2.50; and during the war the company there paid the entire tax levied by Congress in addition, while this company here not only charged the consumers, the inhabitants of the city, with the tax, but actually charged the Government with the tax under a provision of the tax law which provided that wherever the price of gas was fixed by law the gas companies might charge the tax to the consumers in addition. The amount of gas consumed here and paid for by the Government is annually between eighty and ninety thousand dollars—sometimes over one hundred thousand dollars in a single year. The Senator will see by the report that at Pittsburgh the price of gas is $1.60; at Detroit I think it is $1.90, while in Florida at some places they charge ten dollars and in some other States five or six, and even eight dollars.

The committee I may say have also received many proposals upon the part of other parties to organize new companies with a guarantee to furnish gas even for two dollars a thousand cubic feet, and some of them even less than that, manufactured from petroleum. However, the committee have not thought it wise to embark in any experiments but to wait until these new processes shall have been tested in large cities, so that there shall be no chance for failure if they should be adopted here.

I now move to amend the bill in line 6 of section 1 by striking out the words "city of Washington," and in line 14 by striking out "city of Washington."

Mr. CONKLING. What is the effect of that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Merely to have it apply to the District of Columbia so far as the quality of the gas furnished is concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. In line 21 of section 1 I move to strike out "city of Washington" and insert "District of Columbia;" so as to read, "to be recovered before the proper tribunal and paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia aforesaid," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. In section 3, line 5, I move to fill the blank with "feet;" so as to read, "two thousand feet."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. At the end of section 3 I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the cost of fitting up said laboratory shall be paid for by each gas company in the District of Columbia in proportion to their sales of gas for the year 1873.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to strike out in line 2 of section 9 the words "city of Washington."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. In line 6 of section 12 I move to strike out "quarterly" and insert "monthly;" so as to read, "monthly bills."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. On line 12 of the same section, after the word "thousand," I move to insert "two hundred;" so as to read:

And the said company shall light, extinguish, keep clean, and repair the Washington City street-lamps at the uniform price of forty dollars for each lamp per annum, to burn twenty-two hundred hours per annum, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I now move as an additional section the following:

SEC. —. That any person who, with intent to injure or defraud any gas company in the District of Columbia, shall make or cause to be made any pipe, tube, or other instrument or contrivance, or connect the same or cause it to be connected with any main service pipe or other pipe for conducting or supplying illuminating gas, in such manner as to connect with and be calculated to supply illuminating gas to any burner or orifice by which illuminating gas is consumed around or without passing through the meter provided for the measuring and registering of the quantity of gas there consumed, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding six months or by fine not exceeding $250.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. That the price which may be charged for gas by the Washington Gas-light Company shall be uniform and the same to all consumers, and any reduction made in the price or cost to any person or persons except to officers of the company shall furnish a legal right on the part of any other person or persons to demand gas at the same cost or price.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I should call up the civil-rights bill but that I am informed there are one or two Senators—at least one—who wish to speak and are not prepared to speak to-day. For that reason I do not call it up now. I will say further that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary wished me to give notice that he would to-morrow at one o'clock call up the Geneva award bill.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 207) for the relief of C. E. Rogers;

An act (S. No. 259) to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with Henry C. Carey; and

An act (S. No. 470) for the relief of James R. Young.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 498) to settle the accounts of Captain A. B. Dyer.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 149) for the relief of certain settlers on the Fort Randall military reservation.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of five thousand copies of the memorial services which were held in the House of Representatives April 16, 1872, in commemoration and honor of the late Samuel F. B. Morse, for the use of the House of Representatives and the Senate; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message likewise announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2246) relating to circuit courts of the United States for the district of Alabama; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3073) to amend section 19 of the act approved August 18, 1866, entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BOREMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours and thirty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 6, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, presented a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting revised estimates of appropriations for public buildings for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. DAWES. When a motion was made on Monday last that hereafter the House should meet at eleven o'clock, I voted against it, because my own committee had so much to do that I did not feel as if it were possible for me to come here at eleven o'clock, but a very large majority, almost two-thirds of the House, voted in favor of meeting at eleven o'clock. The pressure of business upon Congress increasing every hour compels me, so far as I am personally concerned, to yield to the inconvenience that it would involve me in, and I now ask unanimous consent that, until otherwise ordered, the House shall meet at eleven o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. CROSSLAND. I would like to have the condition made that we are to have no more evening sessions.

Mr. GARFIELD. The question is between doing this and sitting until August.

Mr. DAWES. I think if we agree to meet at eleven o'clock, a majority of the House will be opposed to evening sessions.

Mr. PELHAM. I object, absolutely and unqualifiedly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has given it as his opinion heretofore that when the House has met at eleven o'clock evening sessions have been dispensed with, because the House has found that it can do more work during the day sessions.

Mr. CROSSLAND. I make no objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. PELHAM. I insist on my objection.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to say that I made the motion to change the hour of meeting on Monday last because my experience has satisfied me that if we meet at eleven o'clock we can accomplish much more business during the day than we can by meeting at twelve o'clock and then holding an evening session.

Mr. DAWES. I agree to that.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I am satisfied that a large majority of the House were then and are now in favor of that motion; and I hope the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw his objection, and that the order will be made now. There was but one objection made to my motion last week, and that was by a gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the general experience has been that the meeting of the House at eleven o'clock promotes business much more rapidly than an attempt to have evening sessions.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has spoken of the business before committees. There is already more business reported by committees than can be disposed of at this session. Here is the general Calendar upon which there are perhaps sixty or seventy bills, and we have never taken up the general Calendar or passed a single bill upon it. There is no reason why the committees should meet every morning at ten or half-past ten o'clock for the purpose of reporting bills which can never be passed. There are bills of public importance that certainly ought to pass. The appropriation bills ought to pass speedily, and I have no doubt that there are important measures before the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman has alluded to the fact that there is as much business now before Congress as can be done this session. He will recollect that the Committee on Ways and Means has not been called for two months. It has been waiting for a call now for weeks, and the Speaker has indicated that it will probably be two weeks before it will be called. Now the Committee on Ways and Means has business before it of such a character that the country will not excuse us if it be not submitted to the House. I made this motion because I felt that having opposed it a day or two ago it became me to do something toward promoting the business of the House. The Committee on Ways and Means now meets, and has met all winter, every day at ten o'clock, and will be obliged to meet every day for several weeks to come. It has also held evening sessions until ten o'clock during a considerable part of this session.

Mr. PELHAM. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman objects to the motion, I give notice that I shall move toward the close of the session each day that the House take a recess until eleven o'clock the next day. A majority of the House can do that.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will be here at night sessions, then.

The SPEAKER. That brings the matter within the control of the majority.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. And I give notice that on Monday next I shall renew the motion to suspend the rules and adopt this resolution.

Mr. DAWES. In reply to the remark of the gentleman on my left, [Mr. RANDALL,] I have to say only that I have been in this Capitol on public business as many nights during this session of Congress as any other live man.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman seems to take my remarks very seriously. I only meant, in view of what took place here last night——

Mr. DAWES. The House, for some reason or other, has given me permission to be absent during its sessions on committee business, and I am not away from the House without the consent of the House itself.

Mr. PELHAM. I insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] that hereafter, and until otherwise ordered, the hour of daily meeting be eleven o'clock a. m. The gentleman gives notice that at the usual hour of adjournment on each day he will move that the House take a recess until eleven o'clock a. m. the next day, which will bring it within the power of the majority of the House to meet at that hour on each day if they desire.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. And I give notice that on Monday next I will renew my motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of changing the hour of daily meeting to eleven o'clock.

The SPEAKER. As that cannot be done until Monday, the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts will apply in the mean time.

COURTS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I rise to make a privileged report. The Committee on Revision of the Laws, authorized to report upon the subject at any time, have directed me to report, with amendments, House bill No. 2246, relating to the circuit courts of the United States for the districts of Alabama. The bill was reported on a former occasion, but postponed on account of the absence of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. PELHAM. I reserve all points of order until the bill is read, or until my colleague [Mr. WHITE] shall be present.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be, and is hereby, established a circuit court of the United States for the middle district of Alabama, as said district is now constituted by law, to be held in the city of Montgomery, and a like court for the northern district of Alabama, as said district is now constituted by law, to be held in the city of Huntsville.

SEC. 2. That said circuit courts shall have and exercise, within their respective districts, the same original powers and jurisdiction as are conferred by law upon the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Alabama at Mobile, and shall have and exercise appellate and revisory jurisdiction over the decrees and judgments of the district courts of the United States for the said middle and northern districts, respectively, under the laws of the United States regulating the jurisdiction, powers, and practice of the circuit courts and the judges thereof, in cases removed into said courts by appeal or writ of error; and said courts, and the judges thereof, shall have the general superintendence and jurisdiction over all cases and questions arising in said district courts respectively under the act approved March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," as is provided for in the second section of said act.

SEC. 3. That there shall be appointed for each of said circuit courts for said middle and northern districts by the circuit judge of the circuit a clerk, who shall take the oath and give the bond required by law of clerks of circuit courts, and who shall discharge all the duties and be entitled to all the fees and emoluments prescribed by law for clerks of circuit courts; and the United States marshals for said middle and northern districts shall, respectively, act as marshals for said circuit courts.

SEC. 4. That the clerks of said district courts for said middle and northern districts shall transfer to the clerks of the said circuit courts respectively all the original dockets, records, and files of papers in all common-law and equity causes which might have been brought and would have been originally cognizable in a circuit court, and which were either disposed of or pending in said district courts while the same were vested with circuit-court powers.

SEC. 5. That the circuit court of the United States, held at Mobile, Alabama, shall be designated and known as the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Alabama; and its appellate and revisory power, upon appeal or writ of error, or by bill or petition or otherwise, under the second section of said act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," is hereby restricted to judgments and decrees rendered or causes and questions arising in the district court of the United States for said southern district; and that the fourth section of the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act relating to the circuit and district courts of the United States for the middle and northern districts of Alabama," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 6. That terms of the circuit and district courts for the several districts of Alabama shall be held as follows: For the southern district, the terms of the circuit and district courts shall commence on the fourth Monday of December and the first Monday of June in each year; for the middle district, on the first Monday of May and the first Monday of November in each year; for the northern district, on the first Monday of April and the second Monday of October in each year.

SEC. 7. That the fifth section of the act approved February 22, 1838, entitled "An act to abolish the circuit court at Huntsville, in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes," and the act approved August 4, 1842, entitled "An act to regulate appeals and writs of error from the district court of the United States for the northern district of Alabama," be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 8. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The first amendment was in the second section, to insert after the words "the same original power and jurisdiction as are" the words "or may be;" so that it will read "powers and jurisdiction as are or may be conferred by law," &c.

The second amendment was to add to section three the following:

And the United States district attorney for said districts shall discharge the duties of district attorney in said circuit courts for said middle and northern districts.

Mr. FORT. I would inquire how many districts there are in Alabama?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. There are three. I will state to the House that, by a mistake in a bill passed at the last session of Congress, two of these districts are left without any circuit-court jurisdiction whatever. A man with a patent case or anything which is required to be brought in a circuit court cannot now have any suit in either of those two districts. This bill is to correct that error; it is satisfactory to the judge, and I understand to all the Representatives from Alabama. It does not affect anybody prejudicially, and would have been passed three weeks ago, except that one gentleman from Alabama who had not had an opportunity to examine it was unwell and was not in his seat. It was postponed, with leave to the committee to bring it in again at any time. It ought to be passed as speedily as possible.

Mr. FORT. I understand the gentleman to say that it does not create any new district, any new judge, or inaugurate any new expenses.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It does not. The only thing it does is to give circuit-court jurisdiction in these two districts. It allows the present judge to appoint a clerk for each district where the court is held.

Mr. FORT. It occurs to me that the State of Alabama would hardly require three districts.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. There are three districts there now.

Mr. PELHAM. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] stated that this same bill was offered some time ago. I did not so understand it when the Clerk read it. If this is the same bill that was read here three weeks ago, I must object to it. I ask that it may be read again.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I was not precisely correct in that statement. The bill before presented provided that the circuit court should be held for the two districts only in one of them.

Mr. PELHAM. Then this is not the bill that was offered before?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Not the one that was read.

Mr. PELHAM. The gentleman stated, when the bill was offered before, that nobody could make any objection to it that he could understand. It seems now that objection has been made which he could understand, and therefore he has changed the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It seems to me that this bill should come from the Committee on the Judiciary, or at all events should be examined by that committee.

Mr. FORT. I would inquire of the gentleman in charge of this bill whether he does not think the public business in the State of Alabama would be served by consolidating these three districts into two districts?

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I will answer by saying that it would seem to me, if it were an original question, that the State of Alabama had more districts in proportion to its population and business than many other States in the Union.

Mr. FORT. The State of Illinois has but two districts.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. The purpose of this bill is not to interfere with existing law except to provide for circuit-court jurisdiction where now there is none. So far as regards such jurisdiction those two districts are at present out of the Union. It seems to me that the question how many districts the State should have cannot properly arise on a bill of this kind. Any gentleman is of course at liberty to introduce a bill to reduce the number of districts in Alabama if he thinks that desirable; but while there are three districts the citizens in each ought to have the same rights of suing and being sued in the courts of the United States that citizens in other districts have. There is but one district judge and but one circuit judge. The marshal and other officers are to be the same.

Mr. FORT. It occurs to me that if the House refuses to pass this bill, it will be more likely that the committee will bring in a bill consolidating the districts, and making but two. Many States much larger than Alabama, much more populous and wealthy, have but two districts, and some but one.

Mr. PELHAM. There is only one judge. This is a matter of convenience to him. He drew the bill. He will receive the same salary.

Mr. FORT. But these districts all create expense for marshals, clerks, court-houses, &c. There must, of course, be some place to hold the court.

Mr. WHITE. I think I can explain this matter so that the gentleman can understand it. In Alabama there are two northern districts; for one the court is held at Montgomery, for the other at Huntsville. Heretofore the district court has had circuit-court jurisdiction. By an act of the last Congress such jurisdiction was taken from the district judge and, according to the design of the bill, was to be transferred to the circuit judge. But upon an examination of the act and a discussion of the point before the judge of the circuit court, it was determined by him that the terms of the act were not sufficient to transfer the jurisdiction which had heretofore been vested in the district judge.

Mr. FORT. Can the gentleman tell the House whether court-houses have been erected at the places he mentioned?

Mr. WHITE. This is simply a question of transferring the circuit-court jurisdiction, which was formerly vested in the district judge, to the circuit judge.

Mr. FORT. But my question is, have court-houses been erected where those courts are to be held?

Mr. PELHAM. We have no United States court building.

Mr. WHITE. The courts, I presume, will be held in the same buildings in which they have heretofore been held.

Mr. PELHAM. The United States court is held in the State court-house at Huntsville.

Mr. FORT. It appears that there are no United States court buildings there; and if there are not, we shall be called upon to erect them.

Mr. PELHAM. The gentleman does not understand this matter.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] does not apprehend this question properly. There have been three districts in Alabama for a great many years; and the district judge has had circuit-court jurisdiction up to last year, when we took it away from him and intended to confer it on the circuit judge in accordance with the practice in nearly all other districts in the United States. But through a mistake in the bill the transfer of jurisdiction was not effectually made to the circuit judge, although it has been taken away from the district judge. If this bill passes courts will be held in just the same places as heretofore, with no more expense, with no more inconvenience to anybody than under the old system. The object of this bill is simply to place the circuit-court jurisdiction where it was intended to be placed by the bill of the last Congress, which through an oversight did not accomplish the object. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, which was first upon agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. E. R. HOAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SETTLERS ON FORT RANDALL MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The Committee on Military Affairs, authorized to report at any time on this subject, have directed me to report back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. No. 149) for the relief of certain settlers on the Fort Randall military reservation.

The bill was read.

The first section authorizes the Secretary of War to transfer to the custody of the Department of the Interior such portions of the military reservation of Fort Randall, in Dakota, as were actually occupied by settlers prior to the promulgation of the order of the President of June 14, 1860, setting apart the reservation for military purposes, and, further, such portions of the said reservation as were released from military occupation and control between the years 1867 and 1870, and were during that time settled upon in good faith, and in the belief that the lands were open to settlement.

The second section authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to confirm, in accordance with existing laws, the titles of such settlers upon the military reservation of Fort Randall as may be reported by the Secretary of War for that purpose, and to cause patents to be issued for such lands as the aforesaid settlers may be entitled to under existing laws and the provisions of the act.

The third section provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to each of the aforesaid settlers the respective amounts that were appraised as the value of their respective improvements, by a military board of survey convened for that purpose, at Fort Randall, under instructions from the War Department, dated March 3, 1871; provided that in case any improvements or portion thereof shall have been restored or delivered to any settler after the appraisement of the same by the said military board of survey, such settler shall not be entitled to payment under this act for the improvements or portion thereof so restored or delivered to him.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ABSENCE OF CONSULAR AGENTS.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 3073) to amend section 19 of the act approved August 18, 1856, entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States," with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that section 19 of the act approved August 18, 1856, entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States," is hereby amended to read as follows:

SEC. 19. That no such officer as is mentioned in the first, second, third, fourth, sixth, or seventh sections of this act shall, nor shall any consular agent, be absent from his post or the performance of his duties for a longer period than ten days at any one time, without the permission previously obtained of the President. And no compensation shall be allowed for the time of any such absence in any case except in cases of sickness; nor shall any diplomatic or consular officer correspond in regard to the public affairs of any foreign government with any private person, newspaper, or other periodical, or otherwise than with the proper officers of the United States; nor, without the consent of the Secretary of State, previously obtained, recommend any person at home or abroad for any employment of trust or profit under the government of the country in which he is located; nor ask or accept, for himself or any other person, any present, emolument, pecuniary favor, office, or title of any kind from any such government.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Does this come from the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. BANNING. It does.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I hope we will have some explanation of it.

Mr. BANNING. Mr. Speaker, under the law as it now is, no diplomatic or consular officer representing the United States Government can recommend any person at home or abroad for any employment of trust or profit under the government of the country in which he is located, nor ask nor accept for any person any pecuniary favor or office from such government.

This bill so amends the act of August 18, 1856, of the act to regulate the diplomatic and consular system of the United States as to enable diplomatic and consular officers, after first obtaining the consent of the Secretary of State, to make such recommendation.

The interest and welfare of United States citizens in the East, especially in Japan and China, will be advanced by this amendment. It will enable our representatives to foreign governments to protect such Americans as now hold positions and recommend others who are worthy and qualified.

Ministers of European powers, accredited to the government of Japan, are active in obtaining appointments under that government for citizens of their respective countries.

Our minister to Japan, Mr. Bingham, in speaking of this matter in a letter to the State Department, says:

I am constrained to add that one at least of the European ministers has, in person, urged the removal of American citizens now in the Japanese service for the avowed purpose of filling their places with the subjects of his own country, and this, too, in a very important department of this government.

In speaking of Americans in the service of the Japanese government Mr. Bingham says:

A number of respectable citizens of the United States have been for a considerable period of time in the service of the Japanese government and have acquitted themselves creditably in the discharge of their official duties.

The official positions of these Americans in the government of Japan are not only desirable because they will familiarize these Americans with Japanese customs and tend to Americanize the people of Japan, but because these Americans, through their official positions, will have better opportunities to encourage and strengthen our commercial intercourse with this country.

The bill is recommended unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPTAIN A. B. DYER.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 498) to settle the accounts of Captain A. B. Dyer, with the recommendation that it be concurred in.

The Clerk read the amendment of the Senate, as follows:

Strike out all after "cents" in line 5, down to the end of the bill, and insert in lieu thereof these words: "that being the amount charged against him on the books of the Treasury and transferred from the United States depository at Norfolk, Virginia, to the rebel authorities at Richmond, Virginia."

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEETING AT ELEVEN O'CLOCK.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PELHAM] will withdraw his objection to my motion that hereafter the daily meeting of the House shall be at eleven o'clock a. m. instead of twelve o'clock m.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to add to that that we shall agree to sit until five or six o'clock if the House shall so desire it.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is a very good suggestion, but we cannot make any such provision now.

Mr. RANDALL. If the House will agree to sit from eleven to five o'clock in the evening, that is for six hours, the additional hour and a half which will be secured—for when we take a recess we generally take it at half-past four o'clock—will be, in my judgment, more than equivalent to an evening session, so far as the work which will be done is concerned. I think if the House will come to such a unanimous understanding, it will be the best thing we can do under the circumstances.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Why did not the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] see the importance of our meeting at eleven o'clock on Monday last when he opposed the motion which I made on that day that thereafter the hour of meeting should be eleven instead of twelve o'clock?

Mr. RANDALL. Sometimes we may desire to sit until six o'clock in the evening, and under my suggestion this will be in the control of the House. If we agree to sit from eleven until five o'clock we will gain an hour and a half, and that hour and a half is equivalent to an evening session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has never known any necessity for an evening session when the House has met at eleven o'clock—never.

There was no objection, and it was ordered that hereafter the daily meeting of the House should be at eleven o'clock a. m.

Mr. DAWES. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AFFAIRS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask unanimous consent to submit the minority report from the Committee on the Judiciary on affairs in South Carolina, and move that it be recommitted, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I now ask that the report may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I object.

Subsequently Mr. WARD, of Illinois, withdrew his objection, on condition that the majority and minority reports should both be printed in the RECORD.

They are as follows:

MAJORITY REPORT.

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of the taxpayers' convention of South Carolina, asking for relief against the alleged misgovernment in that State, respectfully report:

That a committee appointed by said convention, and also members of the central committee of the republican party of the State of South Carolina, appeared before the Judiciary Committee and presented fully and at length the allegations and arguments on the part of the memorialists on one side, and the answers and arguments on the part of the counter-memorialists on the other. The following statement presents in an abbreviated form the substantial grounds of complaint which were alleged on the part of the petitioners, and also the counter-allegations and answers to such complaint which were made on the part of the republican committee.

It is alleged by the memorialists that the debt of the State has increased from about five million dollars, the amount before the war, to more than sixteen million dollars; that the value of real and personal estate in the State having been reduced from the amount of five hundred millions to one hundred and sixty millions, the taxes have increased from an average annual amount of $400,000 to the sum of two millions and upward; that the property of the State is substantially held by about three hundred thousand of the white population, who have no real representation, for the reason that the political power of the State is controlled, and the taxes are assessed and levied, by a majority who do not pay taxes, and who are banded together by political prejudices, thereby depriving the minority of the people of any real representation.

It is also alleged that the expenses incurred by the State government are unnecessary; that numerous frauds have been perpetrated by those intrusted with political power; that large tracts of land have been forfeited for non-payment of taxes; and that there is danger that the property of the people of the State will be entirely confiscated unless relief can be obtained by the interposition of the Federal Government.

On the other hand, the counter-memorialists allege that while it is true that the property of the people of the State has been reduced as claimed, yet more than two hundred and fifty millions of such reduction was owing to the emancipation of the slaves, who constituted that amount of the valuation of property, and the residue was occasioned by the destruction and loss of property growing out of the war.

In explanation, in part, of the increased taxation upon the real estate, it is alleged that in the days of slavery taxes were levied by the large planters, who held supreme power in the State, upon trades, professions, and free colored persons, while the lands owned by the planters were only assessed at one-tenth of their value; that in 1860 there were about 301,000 free population, and about 402,000 slaves in the State, who were treated as chattels, while, now that they have become free, the cost of governing them has greatly increased and is justly chargeable to the State government; that in consequence of the organization of the State upon a free basis there is a much larger number of officers, with salaries to be paid, required to carry on the government, while the expenses of sustaining free schools, at which in 1857 the number of scholars attending was 19,356, while in 1873 the number was 85,753; and also the charges for the State lunatic asylum and penitentiary, and for the colored State orphan-house, served to add to the former expenses.

It was further urged that $700,000 of the increased expenses was incurred in carrying out the new system of purchasing homes for the freedmen, while $6,000,000 of the alleged $16,000,000 had been declared to be illegal, and the Legislature had refused to pay the same, on the ground that the bonds of the State for that amount had been fraudulently stolen by a State officer and hypothecated for about one-third of their nominal value.

It was further alleged that the actual debt and the amount of annual expenses had been greatly exaggerated by the petitioners, and that upon a proper accounting it would appear that the expenses during the six years that the present majority had been in power would not amount to one-half the sum alleged by the memorialists. To show that such expenses are not unreasonable, it was claimed that it would appear from the census of 1870 that the average annual expenses of taxation for State purposes in South Carolina for the last six years was only eight and one-half mills upon a dollar of property, which was considerably less than the rate in either of the States of Alabama, Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Kansas, Louisiana, Nevada, and North Carolina. That it would also appear from the same census that in South Carolina the costs of the State government amounted in 1870 to $1.87 per capita, which was very considerably less than similar expenses in the States of California, Connecticut, Kansas, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Virginia, while the average expenses per capita during the period of six years from July, 1868, to October, 1874, were less than in California, Connecticut, Louisiana, Nevada, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Virginia.

As to the forfeiture of lands for non-payment of taxes, it was admitted that in Beaufort County quite a number of farms had been forfeited, but it was claimed that these were lands that were uncultivated and of little value, and that the Legislature had passed a law giving time for their redemption.

While the counter-memorialists conceded that evils had existed in the administration of public affairs, they claimed that these were being corrected by the majority as rapidly as possible; that by an amendment of the State constitution it was now ordained that the debt of the State could not be increased except by the vote of two-thirds of the voters of the State, and that if left to themselves all valid causes of complaint would be removed, so far as it was possible for any human government to accomplish the result.

They further complained that the memorialists and those whom they represented had steadily refused to co-operate with those of the political majority, who were anxious to introduce reform and economy into the administration of the State government. They alleged that these persons had refused to co-operate in the measures taken for reconstructing the State; that they had insisted upon the doctrine that the reconstruction acts were revolutionary and void, and had steadily rejected all overtures looking to any co-operation with the freedmen, or any portion thereof, while, by the persistent efforts made to decry the credit of the State, and to cast reproach upon any government administered by the representatives of the freedmen, the mischief of the situation had been greatly increased. The petitioners, in reply to these averments, denied that they had refused to co-operate with any of the majority in securing the measures of reform that were desired, and averred that they had honestly and earnestly exhausted all measures that could procure for them relief from the burdens and wrongs of which they complained.

The foregoing outline exhibits with sufficient fullness and minuteness of detail the leading features of the case and counter-case presented by the respective parties to enable Congress to determine whether it is proper to ascertain, by means of a commission or otherwise, the exact condition of affairs in South Carolina, to which the memorialists refer, and also to form an intelligent judgment upon the question whether the Federal Government is clothed with the power and charged with the duty of affording relief by intervening for the purpose of correcting the evils which are alleged to exist. The committee cannot resist the conviction that the peculiar condition of the people of South Carolina is owing, in a great degree, to the extraordinary events that have occurred and the great changes which have been produced within the last few years, for which her present citizens or the majority thereof, are not properly responsible, and which are beyond the reach and control of Congress. The committee refer, in this connection, to the late civil war, and the organic changes in the Constitution of the United States, not for the purpose of reopening the wounds caused by that war, but because it is the duty of statesmen who are invoked to apply a remedy to existing alleged wrongs to ascertain the nature, extent, and origin of those wrongs.

The nation has recently passed through a devastating war, the effects of which have fallen with great severity upon the people of South Carolina. It will not be claimed that the majority of the people of that State, against whom, or their representatives, the present complaints are presented, are responsible, either for the war itself or for the great revolution which was effected by the war, or resulted directly or indirectly from it.

That war commenced upon the soil of South Carolina. It was at the city of Charleston that the first overt acts were committed, and the flames of civil war which burst forth in the attack upon Fort Sumter rapidly extended until the whole country was involved in the conflagration. A very large share of the responsibility for this war against the people and Government of the United States rests upon the statesmen and people of the State of South Carolina.

The result of the war thus commenced was the destruction of slavery and the loss to the slave-holders of that State of two hundred and fifty millions of property invested in slaves. Then came the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution, whereby the emancipated slaves became clothed with all the attributes of citizenship and invested with the right of suffrage. The freedmen now constitute a majority of the people there, and political power has been transferred from their former masters to those who, while in a state of slavery, were denied all participation in the rights and privileges of American citizenship. While the war was raging the sympathies of the slave population were given to the Government, for after the emancipation proclamation was issued they realized fully that the question of their future freedom or slavery was involved in the conflict.

It might naturally be expected that such a tremendous and sanguinary struggle would leave behind it some traces of resentments, and that the race which had been for a long period of time enchained in the bonds of slavery, but was now invested with political power, might use that power to the injury and prejudice of their late masters. But, in the judgment of the committee, the African race has proved that it has not been influenced in its action by resentments or a spirit of revenge and hostility against the white population. No such allegation has been made on the part of the memorialists.

It would be equally natural to expect that in a State where the freedmen constitute a majority of the voting population they would select a considerable portion of their own people to represent them in the Legislature. Considering that such majority had been deprived of the advantages of education, that they were suddenly invested with the powers of government, and that their representatives had not been trained in the science of legislation, or made to feel the duties and responsibilities of their new position, it might be expected that their first experiments in the work of self-government would be less perfect than the work of their predecessors—the cultured and accomplished statesmen of South Carolina. But whatever evils may arise from placing political power in the hands of the freedmen, the responsibility therefor rests not with them, but with the people of the United States. They adopted the constitutional amendments, and they alone can change the Constitution. They fully considered this whole subject before they ratified these amendments. They resolved that slavery should be abolished, and that the ballot should be placed in the hands of every citizen, without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude. They were compelled to choose between this alternative and the disfranchisement of the freedmen, and they concluded that, according to the true principles of republican government, all citizens, learned or ignorant, black or white, should be clothed with the elective franchise. They resolved, also, that this change should be wrought not gradually, but immediately, trusting and believing that the mischiefs arising from it would be temporary only, while under the process of experience and education the race would continue to improve and advance in the knowledge and capacity for self-government.

In the judgment of the committee, the real grievances of the memorialists and those whom they represent relate to these changes in the Constitution. The colored voters of South Carolina are about ninety thousand, and the white voters about forty thousand. Can Congress consistently be required to institute proceedings to amend the Constitution again, so as to restore the old state of things? No one, surely, would venture to advise any such action, while we are yet in the initial stage of the experiments resulting from the recent changes. Taking the Constitution, then, as it is, can Congress take measures to remove the political power in South Carolina from the ninety thousand and confer it upon the forty thousand voters? If Congress should now intervene, what benefit would result, provided Congress had the power, unless the ballot should be taken away in the future from the present majority?

In the opinion of the committee, Congress has no constitutional power to grant the relief which is demanded by the petitioners. Although this objection was presented and fully discussed, the proposition was not controverted that Congress could not interfere in this case, unless the power to act was conferred by some express grant in the Constitution, or was necessary to carry into execution some power that was conferred.

It was claimed on the part of the memorialists that this authority might be found in section 4, article 4, of the Constitution, which is in these words, namely: "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government," &c. No specification, however, was presented showing wherein the form of government existing in South Carolina was not republican. If her form of government was republican when slavery existed, and only a minority of her people were allowed to choose her rulers, it would be difficult to comprehend why it is less republican now that freedom prevails, and all her people are permitted to choose them. Whether we adopt the interpretation which holds that the State satisfies the requirements of the Constitution when the form or frame-work of government is republican, or the other construction which requires the State to adopt a government that is republican in fact, wherein the essential element exists that the people shall choose their own rulers and representatives, in either case no contingency has arisen calling for the interference of the United States. The government of South Carolina was never less aristocratic nor more truly republican than it is now, when every male citizen of suitable age and residence has a voice in all her elections.

Nor are the committee able to discover the force of the claim made by the petitioners that they are suffering from the anti-republican and odious oppression of a system of taxation without representation. The grievance of which the people of the Colonies complained of Great Britain was that Parliament claimed and exercised the right to tax them in all cases whatsoever without their consent, although they had no representatives in the Parliament, and no right to participate in the election of members of that body. The people of South Carolina enjoy the fullest right of participating in the choice of their representatives, and the memorialists and those they represent have elected a fair proportionate number of representatives in both branches of the State Legislature. That they are not in sympathy with a majority of the representatives results not from any deprivation of those rights which pertain to a free people, but from the fact that a majority of the voters enjoying the same right with themselves prefer to elect those who represent their own principles and views.

It was also claimed that the present government of South Carolina was created by Congress, and that Congress had a right, therefore, to impose such conditions upon the government and people as would afford relief in the present instance. The State of South Carolina was not created by Congress, but, as was truly observed in behalf of the counter-memorialists, South Carolina existed as a State before Congress was created, and she participated with her sisters in creating Congress. During the late war the rulers and government of South Carolina became demoralized, and attempted to cast off their allegiance to the Federal Government. Her people claimed to secede from the Union and to form part of a hostile and independent nation. Her officers refused to take the oath required by the Federal Constitution, and all the functions and machinery of the State as an integral part of the Union ceased to exist. When the rebellion was overthrown, it became the duty of Congress to reconstruct the State, to restore the ruptured relations between herself and the Federal Government, and to this end to employ the military authority of the nation to bring her back to the proper sphere. In the exercise of its constitutional prerogative, and during the transition period which elapsed while the process of restoring the normal relations which had been sundered by the war was going forward, Congress imposed certain terms and conditions upon the people of the State, which were intended to protect the nation against similar wrongs in future and to secure the return of her people to loyalty and duty.

But this work of reconstruction has been long since fully completed. The military power was long ago withdrawn from South Carolina. The people of that State fully accepted and ratified the conditions required by Congress. They have accepted the new constitution and government which superseded the old frame-work that had been destroyed by rebellion. South Carolina is now fully represented in the Senate and House of Representatives, and is in the complete possession of all the powers and functions of a free and independent State of the American Union. Congress has no more right to interfere to disturb the operations of her government or to invade the rights of her people than to interfere in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, or Illinois.

It was also claimed that Congress had the same right to intervene in the present case that it had to enact the laws against the Ku-Klux conspirators, the latter being intervention for the protection of the persons of the citizens of the Southern States, and the former for the protection of the property of such citizens exposed to confiscation by the exercise of the taxing power. The precedent is regarded by the committee as plainly distinguishable from the present case. The ground on which Congress assumed the right to enact the Ku-Klux law was that it was authorized by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, which declared that no State should deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, and which conferred on Congress power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of that amendment. The Ku-Klux law was entitled "An act to enforce the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, and for other purposes." Its provisions purport to be aimed at combinations and conspiracies of lawless men, who were engaged in the wicked work of attacking, seizing, and murdering the newly created citizens of the United States and those who sympathized with them. Whether or not the provisions of the act exceeded the boundaries of constitutional power it is not material to consider. It is sufficient that the law was passed to meet a crying evil, against which the State authorities seemed to be powerless, and that evil was the lawless and criminal conduct of bandits, robbers, and murderers, acting not under color of law, but shamelessly violating all laws, and performing their deeds of violence and crime at midnight, while armed to the teeth and united together by horrid oaths and common interests.

There is no analogy between the two case. The acts of which the petitioners complain are lawful acts. They are acts committed by the Legislature of South Carolina, duly elected as the representatives of the people. The complaint is that the taxing power vested in the Legislature as part of the legislative power of the State has been abused. But surely this, if true, affords no ground for Federal interference. The Legislature of a sovereign State of the Union possesses plenary power to exercise the authority of taxation according to its own views of policy and justice, in all cases and under all circumstances, except where it may be restrained by the provisions of the State or Federal constitutions. The only remedy for an improper exercise of the taxing power by the legislative authority of a State lies in an appeal to the people of the State. If the majority of the people approve of and sanction the acts of their representatives, that ends the matter. The framers of the Constitution, representing the people of the States, never prepared nor intended to prepare any scheme whereby the Federal power should step in to protect the people of any State against themselves. They provided for good government, for peace and security; they guarded against foreign invasion and domestic violence; they erected safeguards against the establishment of a despotism, a king, an emperor, a monarchy, or any other anti-republican form of government; and as to the rest, they relied upon a majority of the people to conduct the affairs of the State governments in their own way, subject only to such restrictions as should be found in the fundamental laws of the State or nation.

On the argument before the committee it was claimed by one of the distinguished representatives of the memorialists that Congress should provide that the members of the senate should be selected from the property-holders of South Carolina, and thus secure a check against improvident and oppressive taxation. But what authority has Congress to dictate to South Carolina as to the qualifications of the members of the Legislature? According to the general practice of the people in the several States, no property qualification is required as a condition of enjoying the right of suffrage, or as a qualification for holding any office within the gift of the people. Waiving, however, the consideration of the wisdom or policy of the proposed qualification, it is quite apparent that if Congress can mold the State constitution in this respect, it can do so in every other, and every vestige of State rights and local government would be destroyed.

There exists a strong tendency to appeal to the Federal Government for relief in cases where that Government has no constitutional power, and where the only remedy lies with the people of the State. The present case affords an illustration of such tendency. It is true that during the late civil war the great war powers of the Government and its capacity to preserve itself from destruction were brought into bold relief. But with the return of peace, and the restoration of all the States to their proper relations, these powers have ceased to become operative. The great mass of powers relating to the internal administration of their local affairs belongs exclusively to the States. The fundamental canon of division of powers between the State and Federal Governments, it should be borne in mind constantly, still remains in the tenth amendment to the Constitution, without which the Constitution itself could not have been adopted, and which declares that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The committee have not undertaken to determine, from the somewhat conflicting statements of the parties, whether the facts are as claimed by either side, or whether the allegations of both are not exaggerated or colored by their interests or feelings. It is enough that, in any view of these facts, no sufficient ground has been presented to warrant the interference of Congress. Entertaining this view, it does not seem to the committee that any commission should be appointed to make further investigations upon the matters presented. Such a commission would be attended with considerable expense; it would serve to keep alive the agitation of the subject, to encourage false hopes of ultimate intervention, and would sanction the right of Congress to interfere in matters belonging exclusively to the States.

Nor can the committee concur in the suggestion made by the petitioners, that if Congress has no power to act by way of legislation, it should appoint a commission, to the end that a moral influence may be exerted upon the majority of the people of South Carolina. A commission appointed for such a purpose would be wholly unauthorized by the Constitution. There would be no limits to the fields of inquiry presented in other States for the investigations of commissions intended only to produce a beneficial, moral influence.

The committee are fully sensible of the delicacy and importance of the matters presented for their consideration. They would not withhold any constitutional aid which can be extended to the lives, liberties, and property of any citizens, but they are unwilling to usurp unauthorized authority to accomplish such results.

Nor are they willing to believe that any admonitions from Congress are necessary to impress upon the people of South Carolina a proper sense of their duties and responsibilities. They appreciate the difficulties which have surrounded the people of that State. South Carolina is the field where for the first time in the history of our own country the capacity of the African race for self-government is to be tested. Every consideration of pride, of gratitude to those who have conferred upon them the inestimable boon of freedom, of a desire to prove to the world that they are worthy of the great privileges conferred upon them after the long night of slavery, will prompt them to do justice to all the citizens of the State, to remove, so far as it lies in their power, all just cause of grievance from any portion of their people. If, with such tremendous influences pointing out the path of duty, they shall fail, no moral influence that Congress or the party in power may exert will be effectual.

The committee have confidence in the final success of the great changes that have been wrought in favor of the African race in this country. From the intelligence and capacity exhibited by their Representatives in Congress, and by those who appeared before the committee, they feel assured that they can, if they will, establish their right to the confidence of the country. It is hoped that with the advantages afforded now of acquiring an education, and with the eagerness they display to avail themselves of its benefits, they will be found fully equal to the dignity and duties of their newly-acquired citizenship. It is believed that by the mutual co-operation of both races, by the interchange of kind and friendly intercourse, and by the employment of all those means which are found sufficient in other States, existing evils in the administration of the affairs of South Carolina may be remedied by the people themselves.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the memorialists be denied, and the committee discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

MINORITY REPORT.

The undersigned, minority of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, to whom was referred by resolution of the House the memorial of "the tax-payers and other citizens of the State of South Carolina," respectfully report that, deeply and painfully impressed as they have been and are with the gravity and importance of the subject and the delicacy of the questions presented, after much and careful deliberation they are compelled to dissent from the report and conclusions of their associates on the committee. It is impossible for us to turn a deaf ear to the supplicating wail of three hundred thousand oppressed and despoiled citizens of that once prosperous and happy State, praying only that an inquiry be made into the extent and nature of their alleged wrongs. Nor can we find it in our hearts to tear open again the wounds caused by the war and reproach the memorialists with their conduct in the years that are past, or find in it any reason or justification for refusing the hearing which they request. Their fidelity and submission to the Constitution and laws of the Union are unquestioned now, and their plea is made in sufficiently respectful and humble terms.

The right of petition is the common and inalienable right of all and every citizen of the Republic, the high and the low, the rich and the poor, the white as well as the black, and of both the white and the black without regard to previous condition. Amnesty for the past has been fully granted to the one, and freedom in the future to the other; and both now stand as equals before the law.

The only questions properly and justly to be considered are: Do the petitioners present, do they allege, a case of sufficient gravity and importance; are the wrongs and grievances of which they complain of such a nature as to entitle them to congressional consideration; and has Congress the right, the constitutional power, to investigate their complaint?

And, first, what is the case? We shall not attempt to paint it, or to present it in all its details and extent. The plainest statement of some only of the multitude of facts, without passion or exaggeration, is all that will be attempted, and they, we cannot forbear to remark, must shock, if they do not alarm, every believer in the stability and perpetuity of representative government.

Their allegations are, in substance, as contained in the memorial and as made known to the committee in its presentation, that the entire population of the State consists of 415,814 negroes and persons of color, and 289,667 whites; that of all these only about 300,000 are tax-payers and all the remainder are non-tax payers, and a very large proportion non-property-owners; that the present taxable values or property of the State of all kinds on which taxes can be now levied amount in the aggregate to about the sum of $150,000,000 as against the taxable values of the State before the war of $500,000,000; that the annual levies of taxes now amount to the enormous sum of $2,500,000 levied upon the $150,000,000 as against a little over $400,000 levied upon the $500,000,000 before the war. This astounding exhibit is in no way met or modified by the suggestion of the majority that before the war slaves were estimated in making up the taxable values, or that per capita taxes and taxes upon trades and professions were levied. There stands the present levy of $2,500,000 upon the valuation of $150,000,000, whereas before the war only about $400,000 was levied upon the people and property of $500,000,000 in all the ways and forms suggested. Nor is this increase of the oppressive burden made to appear any the less by the comparison of it with the levies in other States, for the reason that the actual levies in South Carolina are scarcely a moiety of the moneys expended—the debt growing and increasing at an annual rate greater than the taxes assessed.

The memorialists further allege that during the last seven years, since the reconstruction of the State in obedience to the will and requirement of Congress, a majority of the members of the State Legislature have owned no property whatsoever, and the others so little that their official pay counterbalanced all their interests as property-holders; so that the result is that those owning the property of the State have no voice in the government, and those imposing the taxes no share in the burdens of taxation. Thus the government, as represented in the rulers, stands in open and unmistakable hostility to the property, as well as the property-holders of the State. The whole theory of republican government is violated, and instead of being a protection of life, liberty, and property, the government is arrayed against property, and is carried on for its destruction.

It is alleged that there is a combination and fraudulent confederation of the non-property holders and the office-holders or rulers in the government, openly avowed, to take away from the great body of the former and present land-owners the lands which they possess, by means of the oppressive use and abuse of the taxing power. It is thus, under the form and pretense of law, that the owners of the property of the State are alleged to be despoiled and robbed of their property, and their estates divided up and distributed among those who have no property, or forfeited to the State. To this end the salaries of the officials of the State have been increased, since the years 1865 and 1866, from $76,481.63 to $230,797.39 in 1872 and 1873. The cost of the public printing, done by the State officers and let by them to themselves, has grown from $17,446.66 in 1865 and 1866 to the almost fabulous sum of $331,945.66 per annum in 1872 and 1873. More is now paid in one year for the public printing than was paid before the war in sixty years. The legislative expenses during the same periods have increased from $51,337 per annum to $291,339.47, and the contingent fund from $6,092.29 to the prodigious amount of $298,668.38. In all these cases the moneys expended beyond the sum properly payable is so much taken from the owners of property and given to those who had none.

These schemes of public plunder and peculation are not confined to any one set of officials or to any one branch or department of the government of the State, but they all seem to vie with each other in systematic spoliation and robbery. Dishonesty and corruption pervade and permeate the entire system, and characterize all who hold office, from the highest to the lowest. The grade of the office only graduates the sum to be stolen or robbed from the unfortunate tax-payer.

Loans have been contracted; State bonds issued and hypothecated; and the bonded debt increased in six years from $5,000,000 to $16,000,000, and probably even more than this. The public records are manipulated, and the books and accounts so kept that not even the officials themselves can form any idea of the actual amount for which the State is liable. Committees have been paid large sums for their favorable reports on private claims, and votes of the members of the Legislature are openly bought and sold for railroad and other corporate charters. State-bank bills funded by the State to discharge State liability have been reissued by the very persons whose duty it was to have seen them canceled.

It is avowed that the object of this system and policy is to force the land-owners to sell or abandon their lands or take them from them by excessive levies and taxation.

The comptroller-general, in his official report, states the astounding fact that for default in the payment of taxes for the year 1872 alone 268,523 acres of land were forfeited actually to the State. In the county of Beaufort alone, out of twenty-three hundred farms, seven hundred were forfeited to the State during the last year for taxes which the owners could not pay, and more will follow this year under the existing levy. Nor is the condition of the non-land-owner at all improved by this system; but so oppressive and crushing is it that the burden does not weigh down the land-owner alone, for while it deprives him of his lands, others, on account of the weight of the taxation, are unable to buy them, or to hold them if they could buy. Lands are therefore unavailable, either for sale or security in any form, and are rapidly being forfeited and virtually confiscated to the State without benefit to either the sum of the mass of the people or to the State. Wages have fallen, the cost of living increased, the rich are made too poor to hire, the poor made poorer and daily are becoming more incapable of purchasing lands and more hopeless of ever rising above the condition of mere laborers for food and clothing.

The history of the world shows no such monstrous rate of taxation and increase of public debt at the same time, upon the same valuation, as that of South Carolina. It would ruin and destroy any people on earth. It is beyond the power of human endurance. It is simply ridiculous to compare its taxation and pretend that it is not greater than in the States of Connecticut, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, and the other States mentioned by the majority of the committee. Revolution and war would burst forth in twenty-four hours in either of those States, oppressed with half the load of South Carolina.

The judicial department of the government offers no hope and affords no protection. The judges are under the same corrupt influence; they hold their offices subject to the will and caprice of the same combination, and are awed and controlled by the same corrupt power. The jurors are selected by three officials, of whom two are appointees of the governor, and thus the jury is packed and made up in many instances of negroes who can neither read nor write. It is impossible that justice can be had or wrongs redressed under such circumstances. It is mockery, cruel mockery, of a suffering people, weighed down and oppressed as these memorialists and their three hundred thousand constituents are, to commend them to such a source, to such a judiciary, for redress.

The executive department will do nothing for them. It is believed to be the very "head-center" of all the corruptions. It is in the confederation and conspiracy with all the others who gorge themselves upon public plunder and destroy the substance of the people. It is alleged and believed that the executive appointments are farmed out and bartered for money.

The governors themselves have been and are openly and publicly charged with the most nefarious and unblushing schemes of public fraud and robbery; railroads have been purchased by them with public funds for private gain; jobs for the purchase of arms and the purchase and sale of lands of the State are publicly charged upon them. A report of the "joint special committee," written, it is said, by the Hon. B. F. Whittemore, a prominent republican State senator in 1870 and 1871, and made to both houses of the Legislature, commenting on the purchase of arms for the organization of the militia, after stating some irregularities in the expenditure of $171,009.93 for the purpose, declares as follows, namely:

"The committee are forced to the acknowledgment, however unpleasant and humiliating it may be to such as are connected with the fact, that the moneys expended (as vouchers indicate the direction in which the funds were used) were not all paid out for such purpose. In the enrollment and organization of the militia, as well as in the armed force employed by the governor, there was a most ample and complete opportunity for ambitious political partisans and aspirants for re-election to arm and equip a force of personal friends and advocates and pay them 'when on service the same pay and allowances as are given to officers and soldiers of the same grade in the Army of the United States' not out of their own purse, but out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated; the State to be reimbursed by a special tax upon any county into which the governor was compelled to send an armed force. * * * * * * *

"An enrolled, organized, and armed retinue of personal favorites or advocates were commissioned and placed upon his staff at the proper time, as well as ordered to form companies, battalions, regiments, and brigades throughout the State into what was called 'the national guard, alias Scott's militia.' This statement is made from undoubted evidence in the premises, and cannot be controverted. * * * The election in 1870 was carried in part by the means herein stated."

Again, further on, the same report says:

"Nor is this all. A more glaring robbery of the treasury for personal ambition and gain has been perpetrated. * * * The enormous sum of $202,602.66, not appearing anywhere upon the State treasurer's books and never intended for the public eye or ear, has been paid, in addition to the amount already aggregated, for the alteration of arms, which swells the account to $374,696.59.

"The committee are compelled to believe that many of the State officials have been privy to this last and chiefest expenditure, for no such amount could ever have been paid for the work done; and the charges themselves are the evidence of fraud, and the officials could not have sanctioned or winked at it unless in complicity with it."

Again we quote from the same report:

"Nor has the executive been behind his powers, if collateral testimony is sufficient, in his eagerness through confidential friends, old Army companions, or handy resident relatives, to sell tracts of land to the State, and receive the highest possible price for the same without reference to the real value."

And again the committee say:

"That great swindles have been perpetrated; that corrupt means have been used and alliances formed; that the money of the State and the bonds issued have not been disposed of as directed; that one of the land commissioners is not free from speculation, either on his own account or as an agent for other persons or corporations; that the excess of the public stock of the State, created for land-commission purposes, over the par value of the same, in the aggregate amount, has been expended; that the whole spirit, letter, and body of the laws authorizing the appointment of land commissioners—the issue of bonds, the purchase of land, the settlement of the same, the report of the commissioner, everything intended in the act to create a land commissioner and define his powers and duties—have been disregarded or wantonly perverted cannot be gainsaid. That the advisory board are responsible for all of this, the verdict of the homeless and landless, at least, will be recorded."

This committee also report the debt of the State at the time of making the report, including the fraudulent issue of bonds and bonds hypothecated, to have reached the enormous sum of $29,158,914.47. There is no pretense that any portion of the debt has since been paid or any of the bonds redeemed.

Mr. ELLIOTT, colored member of Congress from South Carolina, in a recent speech made at the capital of the State, commenting upon the condition of affairs in the State, spoke as follows:

"Will you permit this state of things to continue? It cannot be hidden that there is something rotten in Denmark. There must be no promised reformation, but practical reform. If there be any one in the way of that reform he should be at once removed out of the path, and now is the time to do it. The national republican party to-day was ready to cut aloof upon the slightest provocation from the corruption now existing in the South, and unless you do something, and that speedily, they will be compelled to cut off the rotten branches. He had warned them of this more than a year ago; this was no new thing. One thing he knew, that instead of being better it appears to be growing worse. The question of the tax-payers' convention is no sore-head movement. The people have a right to petition under the Constitution, and when it came it would come from his constituents, whether they voted for him or not, and he was bound to have it properly referred.

"That petition will be considered; and do not allow yourselves to be misled about it. The only way you can prove that you sympathize with an honest administration of affairs is for you to give notice to those who have maladministered affairs to quit; for you to bring forward a new set of men. It is your duty to vindicate yourselves, and prove to the world that you are in sympathy with those who want an honest government. He had no cause here to announce or champion the cause of any particular set. But it was his duty to point attention to errors that have nearly resulted in the bankruptcy of the State. It was time that the hands that had caused these errors were stayed. It does not mean the ascendency of one particular set of men over another, but it means order and good government. The opposite course would breed revolution and anarchy."

What is there, then, to justify the "confidence" of the majority of the committee, as expressed in their report, "in the final success of the great changes that have been wrought in favor of the African race in this country!" According to Mr. ELLIOTT, instead of being better, it appears to be growing worse. After seven years of fraud, dishonesty, and unparalleled corruption and maladministration, "it appears to be growing worse." It does indeed appear to be growing worse.

And if any further testimony were needed, it is to be found in the printed reply of the "republican State central committee of the union republican party of South Carolina" to the tax-payers' charge, "that members of the Legislature are accustomed to take bribes for favorable reports upon private claims against the State." This remarkable document, signed by twenty-four of the leading men of the State and presented to the Judiciary Committee by themselves, unblushingly admits the full charge, and seeks to justify it by alleging that it is done by republicans and democrats alike. This central committee say, "Whatever corruption may exist in the Legislature is to be attributed to the democrats as well as the republicans. They never hesitate to offer bribes when they have a private bill to pass."

Was there ever a more brazen admission of legislative infamy and corruption? Comment upon such a defense is unnecessary. The appeal of the memorialists is not a partisan appeal. It is an appeal of the people for protection from corrupt and oppressive rulers, who are wickedly and cruelly confiscating their estates and destroying their property.

In the face of all this, the majority of the Judiciary Committee, with sublime confidence and satisfaction, calmly tell the people of South Carolina and the whole country that—

"From the intelligence and capacity exhibited by their Representatives in Congress and by those who appeared before the committee, they feel assured that they can, if they will, establish their right to the confidence of the country."

We confess we feel no such blessed assurance, no such exalted faith and confidence. We see nothing to give hope of better things in the present rulers of that afflicted State. All the government there is there is absolutely vicious and corrupt. Who is so credulous as to believe that order will come of itself out of anarchy, honesty out of corruption, or good government be administered by thieves and robbers, who openly and publicly boast of their shameless iniquities and wrongs? It can only be expected, as Mr. ELLIOTT says it appears, that it should grow worse and worse.

All the testimony from every source goes to confirm the allegation of the memorialists that there is really no government worthy of the name in South Carolina. Hon. James S. Pike, late United States minister to the Hague, a northern man, a republican, who has traveled extensively in the State and been at great pains to thoroughly inform himself of its condition, has just published a book entitled the Prostrate State, in which he speaks as follows of it:

"The rule of South Carolina should not be dignified with the name of government. It is the installation of a huge system of brigandage. The men who have had it in control and who now have it in control are the picked villains of the community. They are the highwaymen of the State. They are professed legislative robbers. They are men who have studied and practiced the art of legalized theft. They are in no sense different from or better than the men who fill the prisons and penitentiaries of the world.

"They are, in fact, of precisely that class, only more daring and audacious. They pick your pocket by law. They rob the poor and the rich alike, by law. They confiscate your estates by law."

We have now thus far faithfully, and as briefly as we could, endeavored to present the case alleged by the memorialists upon which they ask Congress to intervene for the investigation into the condition and government of South Carolina. It will readily be perceived that, as a predicate for the conclusions of the minority of the committee, the allegations and charges of the memorialists are to be taken as true. The jurisdiction to make the investigation being denied, its consideration must be upon the strongest statement that can be made on their behalf. All presumptions of the truth are to be given to their statements. The majority in their report say they have not undertaken to determine whether the facts are as claimed by either side; that it is enough that in any view no sufficient ground has been presented to warrant the interference of Congress.

And here at this point commences the gravest, most delicate, and perhaps the most difficult duty the minority of the committee have to perform. We yield to none in our respect for the rights of the States and our veneration for local self-government. Our love of the States out of which the Union is formed is only equaled by our love for the Union itself. We have watched with painful anxiety the tendency of our Government toward centralization and the growing disposition of the Federal Government to interfere with or to trench upon the proper and constitutional jurisdiction and rights of the States. We believe the Union can only be preserved by the preservation and protection of the States in all their rights and powers, and that any improper interference will be as fatal to the Union as to the States. At the same time we know that "the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." No subjects of greater importance or more essential to the happiness and well-being of a free people can possibly be imagined than those declared to be the primary objects of the Federal Constitution.

"To establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity" are certainly among the very highest objects of human governments, and it is for an invasion in a greater or less degree of every one of these essentials the memorialists and their constituents complain. We are aware of the doubts and difficulty in pointing out the precise clause in the Constitution authorizing the intervention; but that protection in all these things is essential to good government no one denies.

It should never be lost sight of that for the condition of things now existing in South Carolina the Federal Government is primarily responsible. Blink it, look upon it as we may, horrible as the work of its hands may now appear, Congress set up and established the state of things that makes the Commonwealth of South Carolina the foul stigma it now is in our system.

We do not argue the right of interference on that ground at this time, but we submit that we subject our governmental theories to the contempt of the world and all intelligent men in that we were all-powerful to inaugurate and establish the pandemonium now existing there, and the very moment it is done are utterly powerless to interfere with it at all or save the property of the people from the spoilsman. Nor can we forbear the suggestion that if this appeal were on behalf of three hundred thousand negroes instead of three hundred thousand white southerners of our own race and blood, such are the sympathies of the majority, as heretofore exhibited, that they would find, by right or by wrong, some means of relief; the petitioners would not have been so coldly and flippantly turned away. It is indeed a matter of the greatest delicacy for the Federal Government to intervene to protect a part of the people of a State from the oppressions and misrule of the other; it is conceded that it ought not to be done for light and trivial causes. But it is not a light or trivial cause that three hundred thousand people—all the property-holders of a great State—are being stripped and despoiled by usurpation and fraud. That there ought to be some power in the Government authorized and adequate in such an emergency to save them all lovers of honesty and good government will admit. It is a fundamental defect in our system if there be not. And in view of the thoughtful wisdom and foresight of the authors of our Constitution are we prepared to render such judgment? Are we prepared to decide that our Constitution of government is so fatally and irreparably defective? It cannot be that a system ordained for the high and holy objects of protecting the lives, liberty, property, and happiness of the people is obliged to look upon the destruction of them all without the jurisdiction and power to save.

The memorialists have invoked the power and duty of the Government under the fourth section of the fourth article—

"The United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government."

Wise men, statesmen, in their sensitiveness in regard to the reserved rights of the States and their dread of centralization of power in the Federal Government, are disposed to hesitate at the suggestion of the right of intervention in any new case. It is no reason, however, that a power existing in the Constitution and not heretofore called into requisition should not be exercised when the occasion demands it. The condition of South Carolina is anomalous. It presents the first instance in the history of this country, if not of the world, when those who pay the taxes have no voice in their imposition, and those who impose them bear none of the burdens of taxation.

It is not the case stated by the majority of the committee, that "the acts of which the petitioners complain are lawful acts." We would not contend that legitimate taxation, however burdensome, would be a cause for intervention. We do not deny that taxation for lawful purposes, even to the great burden and ruin of some of the people, is a sovereign right, which the State has "plenary power to exercise." But the complaint of the memorialists is that the rulers of the people of South Carolina have usurped the power to tax the property-owners, not for legitimate purposes, not for the support of the government of the State, but for the purpose of impoverishing the tax-payers and enriching themselves; for the purpose of "taxing the white man down to the level of the negro."

The usurpers, under pretense of the taxing power, are endeavoring to distribute the property of the owners among those who have none. And the question is presented whether this is not a usurpation by the rulers of the State against which the guarantee was intended to protect. Let it be understood that it is not a mere abuse of the taxing power of which they complain. It is an utter perversion of the power from all the legitimate objects and purposes of taxation. And can there be a republican form of government in a State where it is done? One of the main objects of government being the protection of the property of the citizen, and the citizen in the enjoyment of his property, is that a republican government in which it is not done?

To guarantee a republican form of government must mean more than the guarantee of a mere form—the outline, framework, constitution, and ordinary officials of a republic. If only this is meant in the guarantee, then it will be conceded that South Carolina does not require and cannot ask the exercise of the guarantee power. In the judgment of the undersigned it contemplates and should require a republican government in spirit and in fact, a government in which the life, liberty, and property of all the citizens have just and equal protection. Without these essentials the government, whatever its form, and however liberal and just the provisions of its constitution, is not a republican government within the meaning and proper interpretation of the guarantee clause.

But it is said that the officers who now rule the State were elected by and on the choice of the majority of the people, and that therefore whatever they may do, whatever usurpations or frauds they may commit, whatever ruin they may work upon the people, the United States can do nothing; it must sit with hands folded and let the devastation and spoliation go on.

In the language of the majority of the committee, "if the majority of the people approve of and sanction the acts of their representatives, that ends the matter."

This was not the interpretation given to this guarantee power of the Constitution by Alexander Hamilton, who says of it:

"Without a guarantee the assistance to be derived from the Union in repelling those domestic dangers which may sometimes threaten the existence of the State constitutions must be renounced. Usurpation may rear its crest in each State and trample upon the liberties of the people, while the national Government could legally do nothing more than behold the encroachments with indignation and regret. * * * The inordinate pride of State importance has suggested to some minds an objection to the principle of a guarantee in the Federal Government as involving an officious interference in the domestic concerns of the members. A scruple of this kind would deprive us of one of the principal advantages to be expected from the Union, and can only flow from misapprehension of the nature of the provision itself. It could be no impediment to reforms of the State constitution by a majority of the people. In a legal and peaceable mode this right would remain undiminished. A guarantee by the national authority would be as much directed against the usurpation of rulers as against the ferments and outrages of faction and sedition in the community."

Also Mr. Hamilton, in number 51 of the Federalist, while defending the Constitution, to insure its adoption by the States, writes as follows:

"It is of great importance in a republic not only to guard society against the oppression of rulers, but to guard one part of society against the injustice of the other part. Justice is the end of government; it is the end of civil society; it ever has been and ever will be pursued until it be obtained, or until liberty be lost in the pursuit. In a society under the forms of which the stronger factions can readily unite and oppress the weaker, anarchy may as truly be said to reign as in a state of nature, when the weaker individual is not secured against the violence of the stronger."

Mr. Calhoun, in his letter to Hon. William Smith, on the subject of the Rhode Island controversy, discussing this guarantee clause, says:

"I come now to the last in the order in which I am considering them, but the first as they stand in the section, and the one immediately involved in the question under consideration—I mean the guarantee of a republican form of government to every State in the Union.

"I hold that, according to its true construction, its object is the reverse of that of protection against domestic violence; and that instead of being intended to protect the governments of the States it is intended to protect each State (I use the term as defined) [the people of the State] against its government, or, more strictly, against the ambition or usurpation of its rulers. That the objects of the Constitution to which the guarantees refer—and liberty more especially—may be endangered or destroyed by rulers, will not be denied. But, if admitted, it follows as a consequence, that it must be embraced in the guarantees, if not inconsistent with the language of the section. But, if embraced, it must be in the guarantee under consideration, as it is not in the other two. If it be added that, without this construction, the guarantees would utterly fail to protect the States against the attempts of ambition and usurpation on the part of rulers to change the forms of their governments and destroy their liberty—the danger above all others to which free and popular governments are most exposed—it would seem to follow irresistibly, under the rule I have laid down, that the construction I have placed upon the provisions as to the object of the guarantees is the true one. But if doubts should still remain, the fact that it fully explains why the provision requires the application of the State, in case the guarantee against domestic violence is omitted, would place it beyond controversy; for it would be a perfect absurdity to require that the party against which the guarantee is intended to protect should make an application to be protected against itself."

These are the views of some of the statesmen of the past upon this guarantee clause. Mr. Calhoun of all men was not likely to have given a strained construction of the Constitution in favor of the exercise of doubtful powers by the Federal Government. And he tells us plainly one of the objects of this guarantee is to protect the people of the state from the usurpations of their rulers. Mr. Pike, in the language before quoted, says:

"The rule of South Carolina should not be dignified with the name of government. It is the installation of a huge system of brigandage. The men who have had it in control, and who now have it in control, are the picked villains of the community. They are the highwaymen of the State. They are professional legislative robbers."

If the Chinese in sufficient numbers, after naturalization, should take possession of California, elect themselves to offices, and then under the forms of law, and under pretext of the taxing power, commence to divest the owners of the lands and divide them up among themselves, would California still be a State republican in form?

Her constitution is unchanged, the republican form, if that be it, still exists, but who will contend that it is any longer a republic? And is there for such a state of things no remedy? Would the Federal Government be justified in permitting the work of spoliation to proceed? Would there be any reasonable hope that the evil would be corrected by the robbers, or the wrong right itself? Would the United States answer the appeal of the suffering citizens by telling them to wait till their despoilers should learn and understand the spirit and genius of our system, till they should become educated and civilized so as to understand their duty as citizens of the Republic?

Cæsar, Cromwell, and Napoleon as first consul, maintained the republican form of government; but who will contend that Rome, Great Britain, or France were republics under their domination?

It should not be forgotten that this guarantee is an obligation on the part of the United States for the benefit of the States and the people of the States as well as the Union. It is the consideration of constitutional allegiance, and cannot be refused or neglected without forfeiture thereof.

To fail to exercise this important power by the United States in the proper case, however delicate the duty or however great the danger of improper interference, is to fail to perform one of its most solemn obligations. It cannot be neglected or postponed without the greatest wrong on its part and the greatest danger to our institutions. It is an ever-existing and binding obligation, and upon its prompt, timely, and wise exercise may depend the perpetuity and harmony of our system of States and Union.

And the undersigned here most respectfully suggest that if the memorialists have alleged a case of reasonable doubt only, of the duty and power of the United States to make the investigation asked, then it seems to us clearly the duty of Congress to inquire further. The case is one certainly to be further investigated. The condition of South Carolina is most deplorable. We have been accustomed to sympathize with and commiserate the down-trodden people of Poland and Ireland, but they are no worse off than the white people of South Carolina.

But if the power of Congress to intervene remedially on behalf of the aggrieved and wronged citizens of that suffering State be still denied or doubted under the guarantee clause and under any of the ordinary powers of legislation, then we insist the committee may be raised and the investigation made under the extraordinary powers of Congress to legislate. We refer to the constitutional power of Congress to initiate amendments to the Constitution itself.

Article 5 provides that—

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress."

This provision vests in Congress special power of a sovereign character, over and above its general legislation, which it may exercise of its own volition independent of the executive and every other department of the Government.

Congress possesses no more exalted and important power than that of initiating amendments to the Constitution. It does this by its own sovereign will, untrammeled and unrestrained by any other department or officer of the Government. It determines the necessity and propriety of the amendment to be proposed, and the time and manner in which it shall be done. The proposal is within its unlimited discretion. In taking this first step Congress acts as a legislative body, and does it by means of the ordinary forms and machinery of legislation. It may be moved in the ordinary way and referred to its committees for consideration and report. The power to propose amendments implies the duty to do so in the proper case. Congress is in duty bound to know the condition and situation of the country and when and what amendments ought to be proposed. A great wrong and grievance like those complained of in the memorial under consideration, threatening to rob three hundred thousand people of their property, brought to the attention of Congress, cannot be passed over without consideration.

Having the power to propose the amendment necessarily implies the means and the duty of informing itself of the evil, its extent, nature, and the remedy required. Having jurisdiction over the subject-matter, investigation may be made to enable Congress to determine whether the amendment is necessary, and what kind, and to what extent it shall go. If the power to investigate implies the power to act legislatively, much more does the power to legislate in a given matter, whether by the ordinary or the extraordinary powers of legislation, imply the power to investigate and consider before the act of legislation is done, and in order that it may meet the necessities of the case.

The actual state of affairs and the condition of South Carolina cannot be known and fully understood by Congress without an investigation by it. The fact alleged by the majority, that the allegations of the memorialists and the "counter-memorialists" are conflicting and contradictory, presents of itself a strong reason for further inquiry. The truth or falsity of the charges ought to be established. None graver were ever made by any people than those against the rulers of South Carolina. We are not able to appreciate the distinction attempted to be drawn by the majority of the committee between the so-called Ku-Klux case and the case of the memorialists. Both cases rest upon the charge of lawless acts; and it can make no difference that one was against life and the other against property. It is the duty of government to protect property as well as life. The government that does not protect both is no better, no more republican, than if it protected neither. Both are objects of the same solicitude in our constitution; they are generally referred to in the same connection, and the provisions which apply to the one apply to the other also. No argument can be made for intervention in the interest and for the protection of life that will not apply with equal force to intervention for the protection of property.

In view of the whole case we cannot hesitate to recommend the appointment of a committee of both Houses of Congress with power and authority to go into the State of South Carolina and fully inquire and investigate into the condition of the State and the charges and complaints of the memorialists. To do less we feel we should violate or neglect a most solemn and imperative duty. The cry of that outraged, helpless, and suffering people has reached our hearts as well as our understanding. That once prosperous and beautiful State is on the verge of ruin. She is, indeed, already prostrate. A horde of thieves and robbers worse than any that ever infested any civilized community on earth have her by the throat and are fast sucking her life-blood. Three hundred thousand of her citizens, descendants of those who fought and won with our fathers the battles of American independence and liberty, are crying to Congress for redress—for help. They have suffered all that humanity can endure. They have exhausted every resource and are utterly helpless of themselves. To refuse their request is to drive them to despair and ruin.

WALLACE MOTT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the draught of a bill for the relief of Wallace Mott, second lieutenant Eighth United States Infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

B. J. DEROCHE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of B. J. Deroche for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

FRANCIS VALLE, JR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the private land claim of Francis Valle, jr.; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

JOHN H. GREGG.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of John H. Gregg for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

J. B. VALLE ET AL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the private land claim of J. Baptiste Valle and Francisco Valle, sr.; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

L. H. DENNIN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of L. H. Dennin for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

WHITE EARTH INDIAN RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting estimates of appropriations for subdivision of White Earth Indian reservation, in Minnesota; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

OSAGE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting estimates to pay to Osage Indians interest on net avails of lands sold under second article of the treaty of September 29, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SUSAN M. RIVERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of Susan M. Rivers for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MEDICAL AND SURGICAL HISTORY OF THE WAR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to an appropriation required for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, for completing the medical and surgical history of the war; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SHAWNEE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting a draught of a bill relating to additional allotments of land for absentee Shawnee Indians, to be paid for by said Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ORDINANCE STORES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the bill (H. R. No. 2724) for the relief of certain States and Territories on account of ordnance stores issued to them during the late civil war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIM OF T. W. M'INTOSH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the act of May 29, 1872, the claim of T. W. McIntosh for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

INDIAN SERVICE IN CALIFORNIA.

CAPTAIN SETH BONNEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the bill (H. R. No. 1518) to restore Captain Seth Bonney to his former rank in the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BARRACKS AT ATLANTA, GEORGIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the purchase of the ground the United States barracks at Atlanta, Georgia, are located on, or other ground at that place, for military purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DR. DUNSCOMB.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the non-receipt by Dr. Dunscomb of three months' pay sent him by mail; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

FORT BRIDGER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in relation to the claims of settlers on the military reservation at Fort Bridger, Wyoming Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DUTIES ON FRUIT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of April 24, 1874, in relation to the refunding of duties upon fruit; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE EASTERN BRANCH.

On motion of Mr. CHIPMAN, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the District of Columbia was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3082) to aid in the construction of a substantial bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac at or near the present navy-yard bridge; and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey, for two days; to Mr. ELLIOTT for ten days; to Mr. WILBER for eight days from to-day, and to Mr. LOWNDES until Monday next.

WISCONSIN INDIANS.

Mr. RICHMOND, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 2017) to provide for the removal of certain Indians from the State of Wisconsin; and the same was ordered to be printed and recommitted to the committee, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KELLEY. Before moving to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order, I will say that I am desirous, if possible, of bringing the general debate on the centennial bill to a close at the earliest moment. I would ask the House to make an order that if it should not have closed by the usual time of adjournment there shall be an evening session for debate only on this subject, no other business to be done, in order to close the debate, if possible, this evening. In making this suggestion I have a single mental reservation, and that is, that if practicable the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] the chairman of the United States commission, may be heard to-morrow morning. Otherwise I would gladly move that debate should close with the evening session.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he include in his order some method by which his bill can be got out of Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. He cannot do that by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAWES. To-morrow we shall meet and go into Committee of the Whole, and then we shall be at sea again.

Mr. GARFIELD. We can make an order about that to-morrow morning.

Mr. KELLEY. Immediately after the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] I intend to move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing the general debate and proceeding to the consideration of the bill or reporting it to the House.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. When does the gentleman propose to make that motion?

Mr. KELLEY. Immediately after the gentleman from Connecticut shall conclude his speech.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I have the floor in Committee of the Whole, and I propose to the gentleman that he take the vote on the bill to-day without any further debate.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I object to that decidedly.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, to-morrow I shall move to close debate. I now ask unanimous consent that we may have an evening session for debate only on the centennial bill, the House meeting in Committee of the Whole, and no other business to be transacted.

There was no objection, and the order was made.

Mr. KELLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the order was made; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Before the House goes into Committee of the Whole I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the session of to-day and the session of this evening be set apart for debate only on the centennial bill. I desire to know if any other business will be done to-day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope unanimous consent will be given that no other business shall be done to-day.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I object.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HAMILTON. Before the House goes into Committee of the Whole, I desire to make the remark that when the House took a recess at five o'clock yesterday I was engaged on the Committee of Investigation of the Affairs of the District of Columbia, and was not apprised of the evening session and did not hear of it until after the adjournment last night.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. KELLEY. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2986) to appropriate $3,000,000 in aid of the centennial celebration and international exhibition of 1876.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, it is always an unpleasant as well as an ungracious task to oppose any scheme that comes before this House for the depletion of the Treasury. Every measure of that character that comes before us comes dressed in its Sunday best, in charge of and chaperoned, so to speak, by members for whom we have the profoundest respect. They come to us, they importune us, they beseech us, and labor with us. "Whatever you may do relative to the measures of our neighbors," say they, "be sure not to oppose this measure." It is a measure upon which they build their highest hopes, their tenderest and loftiest ambition, and, it may be, their highest hope of fame. Now, the real fact probably is that the measure of their neighbor, which they antagonize by that suggestion, has equal merit, equal desert before the country, public and private, with the measure which they solicit you to support. The support which is solicited is courted by a personal friend and associate; your duty may compel you to oppose the interest of your friend and associate. Hence I say it is an unpleasant and ungracious task to oppose these schemes upon the public funds in this House.

So this measure comes before us dressed, as I say, in its Sunday best, chaperoned and in charge of, backed and groomed, so to speak, by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] whose age, whose experience, eloquence, ability, and power entitle him to the respect which he enjoys, as wide as the continent. And he is not alone. He is supported by his colleague from the city of Philadelphia, [Mr. MYERS,] of whom it may be said as of Edward of Lancaster,

> A sweeter and a lovelier gentleman—
> Framed in the prodigality of nature,
> Young, valiant, wise, and, no doubt, right royal—
> The spacious world cannot again afford.

These, too, Mr. Chairman, are supplemented by the entire delegation from Pennsylvania, than whom no more excellent body of gentlemen from any State in the Union can be found upon the floor of this House; a body of gentlemen for whom we of the West entertain the highest and most profound respect for wide liberality on all matters of moment to us. But this is not all; the list of interested advocates of this measure upon this floor would be incomplete without the name of the illustrious gentleman from Connecticut, the president of the centennial board, [Mr. HAWLEY.] To say that these gentlemen constitute an array formidable in character in the support of any measure which they espouse brought before this House is to but feebly describe the force which they put into any movement which they undertake.

More than that, Mr. Chairman, every member of this House has observed the outside force about this Capitol, overhanging the corridors, swarming in the lobbies, present in the committee-rooms, in the niches and recesses of the building, everywhere pressing members to support this measure that proposes to deplete the Treasury to the extent of $3,000,000. Their presence was especially demonstrated in the crowded galleries that we witnessed in the House here yesterday, and by the demonstration of applause exhibited by them toward those gentlemen who spoke upon this floor in behalf of this bill. And, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say parenthetically, but distinctly and emphatically, that I trust such a demonstration will never be again witnessed in this House during this or any other debate. The people of the United States have a right to have their Representatives free from all appearance of approval or disapproval in the immediate presence of the legislative body. You and I, Mr. Chairman, ought never to hear the voice of the people in approbation or disapprobation of what we say or do here, except it comes from somewhere beyond the pale of this Capitol. Every soul of the toiling millions beyond have interests just as dear, just as precious, as those who occupy seats in the galleries by the courtesy of the House. Hence the necessity for the rule whose decorum was violated by the demonstrations of which I have spoken.

Mr. Chairman, it was not my fortune to be a member of Congress when this project of a centennial celebration at Philadelphia was first mooted in this Capitol. But what was said and done here at that time no man can be ignorant of who listened to the record as it was produced by the gentleman from Maine yesterday in his masterly speech and unfolded leaf by leaf to the gaze of mankind. When that speech shall be read, as it will be and as it ought to be in every household of the Republic, what a picture will be presented of the perfidy and folly of legislation if this bill should become a law! Henceforth Punic faith must give way to a more expressive term Legislative promises, "false as dicers' oaths," yield to the pledges of the American Congress. But, Mr. Chairman, at that time I belonged to a higher and more important body, the people, and I well know what they understood to be proposed by the centennial celebration. They understood that a patriotic body of men throughout the country, and especially at Philadelphia, designed, when the hundredth anniversary of American independence should come round in 1876, to celebrate the event in some grand and worthy way by a display of American progress in the arts, manufactures, sciences, and all the elements which go to make up our marvelous civilization. They understood, it is true, that this would cost money, but they also understood that the patriotic gentlemen who moved the affair would raise the funds either out of their own accumulated wealth or by voluntary co-operation on the part of others acting in conjunction with them. They did not expect to be taxed for the centennial celebration. Hence they sang pæans in praise of the movement. Hence the pulpit and the press bade it Godspeed. Hence the farmer and mechanic, the laborer and the professional man, all classes and conditions of our countrymen, hailed the inception of the centennial with joy.

The people understood by the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, just exactly what was claimed for it by its friends at the time, and no more—that it was passed in order to give the event a national character and prestige. How else could they view it, with these expressive words before them in the law?

> SEC. 7. That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners or other officers provided by this act from the Treasury of the United States; and the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition, or by reason of the same.

To a plain, unsophisticated public there is no ambiguity in these words, no latent meaning not expressed in the good English in which they are written; only a lawyer, and I fear a "Philadelphia lawyer," can be in favor of such a monstrosity as this measure under discussion, or would attempt to explain away the force of its words.

Sir, it is idle to say this is not a pledge; that the people do not so understand it; and that it is not a crime to disregard it.

But, Mr. Chairman, the act of June, 1872, is just as bad in this respect for the advocates of this bill. And again I tell you, gentlemen, you have deceived the people if you propose now to foist this tax upon the country, and will be guilty of a double perfidy. Listen to the latest pledge:

> But nothing in this act shall be so construed as to create any liability of the United States, direct or indirect, for any debt or obligation incurred, nor for any claim, by the centennial international exhibition, or the corporation hereby created, for aid of pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States in support or liquidation of any debts or obligations created by the corporation herein authorized.

Mr. Chairman, while the advocates of this bill are howling so lustily about the attitude in which the nation will be placed before the world if this exhibition should fail now, let me commend to their con-sciences the far greater question of how the nation will stand in its own household when it has broken faith with those beneath its own flag and on its own soil. It may humble our national pride to fail in this matter now; it will dishonor us to purchase success at the cost of broken pledges to our own citizens. Better, far better, humbled pride—ay, abased in the very dust—than dishonor and shame at home.

If ill-timed and unfortunate steps have been taken in this matter, retrace them; they are unauthorized acts. If free invitations have been issued and letters have been sent which have misled foreign nations, I trust this nation has the grandeur to recall and explain. I take the President at his word when he says:

> Let us have a complete success in our centennial exposition, or suppress it in its infancy, acknowledging our inability to give it the international character to which our self-esteem aspires.

Mr. Chairman, suppress it. It is no humiliation of pride or self-esteem to me as an American citizen to acknowledge the inability of the American Republic to go on with this proposed international exposition with $2,200,000,000 of debt overhanging it, and to say that we are unable to expend $3,000,000, $10,000,000, $15,000,000, or $20,000,000, whatever it may be, in this exposition in Philadelphia in 1876.

Mr. Chairman, if the passage of this bill would not involve an act of questionable integrity, if it were a matter of perfect faith, the country is in no condition to-day to appropriate $3,000,000 for the avowed object of displaying itself to other nations.

On the 1st day of this month the absolute debt of the United States was $2,149,725,277.02. Besides this enormous sum there are other obligations which it has guaranteed, and which it will have to pay beyond all question, which amount, principal and interest, to $83,251,255.43.

Thus the actual indebtedness of the United States on the 1st day of May, 1874, was $2,232,976,532.45. This guaranteed debt, of course, is all to the Pacific Railroads. A major part of this debt bears interest at 6 per cent. in coin.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this debt was incurred to save the nation, but for that reason is no more sacred than if it had been created for a centennial exhibition or any other act of wisdom or folly. It is the debt of a great nation, and therefore to be paid as nominated in the bonds. When the gentleman from New York praises the Jews of Frankfort and Berlin for taking these bonds when they could buy them at sixty cents on the dollar, at a time when a million and a half of the bravest men were daily indorsing their solidity and validity with their bayonets, I confess I am slightly oblivious of the necessity for the encomium. But let that pass.

While the burden of this debt is great, it is not the only debt. We as a people are in debt to European capitalists; and what with the drain made to pay the interest on our obligations in Europe, public and private, we have no surplus left to expend in luxuries and scarcely enough to buy our necessaries. But we in the West are in a far worse plight than this. We are not only indebted to European capitalists for the money which constructed our railroads and bridges, but we are largely indebted to you of the East for the funds with which we purchased our farms. You own our county, township, and city bonds, ay, you own for the most part the bonds issued for the construction of our school-houses; so that it may almost be truthfully spoken that we of the West are merely occupants of the property of our wealthy eastern creditors. Gentlemen of the East, you had the money, the accumulated wealth of generations; we of the West had only God's heritage and brave earnest hearts with which to conquer the wilderness. You drove sharp bargains with us; you made us agree to pay high rates of interest, and we mean to live up to our promises. We are poor, but we have that which is above wealth—honor.

This is the condition in which the terrible panic of last autumn found us. In the twinkling of an eye values tumbled, industry was everywhere paralyzed, merchants bankrupted, workmen thrown out of employment, and a general derangement and stagnation of business ensued. To-day the aspect is but little better. We bought of you at inflated prices; the panic came, and we wanted to pay our debts. It was thought Congress could help the West by some generous legislation—and I beg the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] president of the centennial commission to heed me—which would enable us to tide over the quicksands of the times and pay our debts in money as good as that which we received from our creditors? Only this and nothing more was sought. The plighted faith of the nation no man of us would break. We saw money in New York held on call at 3 per cent. per annum when it could not be had in the West on the best of security for four times the price. We see this fact to-day.

I repeat that this fact, which I have stated as existing then, exists there to-day: money at 3 per cent. on call in New York, while it can be loaned at 13 or 15 per cent. in Saint Louis and Chicago and not to be had at that.

We passed a bill through Congress in the teeth of your most hostile protest that had in it but little relief beyond the fact that it would remove from New York some twenty-five millions of currency held there belonging to the country banks, and put it in circulation. It would not have helped us much, but our people thought it would; and perhaps it would, because it would have helped to restore confidence to a broken-hearted and dispirited people. But you fought us here bitterly. Not content with that, you beat us with the President and cast us back into the slough of despond from which this little bill had almost lifted us.

Gentlemen, were it in the best of faith, we are in no condition to undertake the burden of this additional tax. We cannot, from sheer lack of ability, pay any more public charge. I think I speak the truth when I say if you build your exposition hall and have an international show, and then furnish us passes over your railroads to come, that we cannot come without you pay our expenses too.

Do not mistake me. We are not ruined, not lost, not despairing. We know ourselves, and know that we shall emerge from the disasters of to-day and the sad ordeals through which we are passing better and wiser men. We still have strong hands and undaunted hearts; we have the garden spot of the earth for our abiding place; we have all the elements of future success, not least of which we account a determined spirit not to add another farthing to our public or private debts, and if the luxury of a centennial celebration can only be had at the cost of breaking this resolve, then away with it. We have the manhood to say we will have none of it. With our wives and little ones we will have a far happier centennial among our own beautiful valleys of the West at home on the Fourth of July, 1876, out of debt and unembarrassed, than all the splendor and pageantry of a world's fair could afford us if the roofs which sheltered these dear ones were owned in part by others.

Mr. Chairman, look at this picture. Forty-two million dollars of a deficit in the revenue in the fiscal year for which we appropriate anticipated and officially announced; the tea and coffee of the poor man proposed to be taxed higher; poor clerks in the Departments cut down in their wages, and Government subalterns everywhere preyed upon by the spirit of economy abroad in all our appropriations; our own salaries reduced so that they will hardly support us; niggardly legislation in all matters of Government necessity everywhere, and three millions at one stroke for the centennial. Great as may be the exhibition at Philadelphia in 1876, neither that nor any fair the world has ever seen, or will see, will equal the folly, stupidity, and crime which we shall exhibit in this Capitol by the passage of this bill. With such a showing pass the bill, and then this Congress should be—> —— as our rarer monsters are,

> Painted upon a pole; and under writ,
> "Here may you see the tyrant."

Is there any gentleman in this House who will tell you that you can construct and build in Philadelphia a hall as cheaply as it can be done in Paris or Vienna, and of the same dimensions? Do the gentlemen who have this matter in charge propose to construct for this international celebration at Philadelphia by the American Republic a building that will be insignificant beside the one which was used for a similar purpose at Vienna or Paris? Is labor cheaper in this country than in Europe? Can materials be had here at a cheaper price for the construction of such an edifice? If I understand this matter correctly, every element of material, of labor, that will go into that building will necessarily be more costly than such material and labor for the exposition buildings at Paris or at Vienna. Let us see what was the cost of the building at Vienna for the exposition there. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an extract from the report of Professor W. B. Black.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The total amount received from visitors from the beginning until the close, on the 2d of November, was 2,567,297.56 Vienna florins, equal, approximately, to $1,283,648.78. The other sources of revenue were the rents of space, the concessions for various purposes, and the sale of the buildings. These sources, it was estimated, would yield, respectively, 1,000,000 for space, 240,000 for concessions, and 4,000,000 for the buildings. This last sum appears to be far too high. The deficiency, probably, will not be less than 12,000,000 florins, or $6,000,000, which the government will meet.
> A later statement places the total outgo as, florins, 19,700,000, or $9,850,000 in United States currency. The income was in round numbers, say, $2,000,000, leaving a deficiency paid by the government appropriations of $7,850,000. But it is probable that the value of the buildings and improvements incident to the exhibition will figure in the final showing as fully equal to their cost.
> At Paris, in 1867, the receipts from visitors were 10,865,419 francs, equal to $2,432,709 in round numbers, and the expenses were about $4,596,763, leaving a deficiency, after adding the receipts from other sources, of 8,869,156 francs, or $1,773,831, which was covered by the appropriations made by the city and state respectively of 6,000,000 francs—a total of 12,000,000 francs, or about $2,400,000.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, it is unnecessary for me to dwell upon the cost of this proposed centennial or international exposition at Philadelphia. No man can count its cost. No man can approximate it. The debts that would arise from it would be like those debts of indefinite and unlimited amount which come up from the South on account of the ravages of the late war. In all human probability, for years after this centennial celebration, there will be a commission sitting here in Washington in judgment upon these accounts, as there is now a commission sitting upon claims arising out of the late war. I think my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] was too limited in his expression yesterday when he said this undertaking would cost the Government $7,000,000. I do not think that amount will begin to cover the expenses that will arise to the Government if it once undertakes this costly project. He stated that the Vienna exposition was a failure although held on the continent of Europe in the midst of two hundred and fifty million people. Ours will be held in the midst of only forty million civilized people on the whole American continent; for we can expect nothing from Mexico. Any one who relies upon any pledge given that this will be the last time the Treasury will be sought to be forced for the purpose of maintaining and supporting this exposition will count without his host.

But, Mr. Chairman, let me briefly pay my respects to the eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] who last spoke upon this bill. His fame is deservedly world-wide; but some think, among which number I find myself, that in practical matters of legislation he is not that success that he is in that other forum where he won the golden stars of his great profession which adorn him so happily. In this assembly one always meets some groveling personage whose characteristics are earthly and practical to a degree that is horrifying to a more refined and sensitive nature. The State of Massachusetts has several such officious members on the floor of this House, I grieve to say. Thus yesterday when my eloquent friend was in the very frenzy of his eloquence, away above the mountain-tops of human passion, that obtrusive gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] arose in his deliberate way from his seat and says, "Will my friend from New York permit me to ask him a question?" "Certainly," says our gifted friend, who is the embodiment of courtesy. I ask the Clerk to read the question and the reply.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question? I wish to ask him where he proposes to get this money, consistently with the pledges of the United States, with the public debt increased $2,000,000 in the last year, and with no provision for a sinking fund; and whether he thinks it becoming in anybody to borrow money to celebrate his birthday?

Mr. TREMAIN. I presume if I was a member of the Committee on Ways and Means of this House I could find means enough to pay $3,000,000. In the name of my country, the richest country on the face of God's earth—a country that during our late war raised daily for months in succession $4,000,000 from its own resources—I trust I never shall be required to find out where $3,000,000 can be raised when we have two years to raise it in.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to ask my friend from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] if he recognizes borrowing as one of our resources.

Mr. TREMAIN. I am not to be drawn into a financial discussion. I am aware that the chairman of our Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DAWES] knows all about that matter, and it is not necessary for me to enter upon that field.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, if this bill were anything in the form of animated nature, the gentleman from Massachusetts would be liable to a charge of cruelty to animals by sending such a shaft to its vitals as it was borne aloft in the fiery eloquence of my friend from New York. To say that the Ithuriel shot eviscerated and disemboweled the bill is to say simply what my friend confirmed and what his better sense knows.

Of course I felt somewhat in sympathy with the gentleman from New York as he threw around me, as he throws around all when he speaks, the charm of his eloquence, when that shot was fired by the practical, the materialistic, the obtrusive, and the offensive gentleman (in that instance only) from Massachusetts; and I rushed at once to grasp the first paper I could find to help my friend from New York in the emergency that was upon him. I seized upon the statement of the public debt of the United States; when, lo and behold, I discovered that this obtrusive citizen of Massachusetts had stocked the cards upon my good friend from New York. What was the very first line of that statement?

Increase of debt since June 30, 1873, $1,906,563.45.

Four million dollars a day! My friend from New York said we could borrow it. Now, there is a limit, I suppose, to the capacity of even this nation to borrow. In individual instances many of us have experienced that limit.

But, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, let me apply what logicians style argumentum ad hominem to this case. Most of you are content with the seats you now hold, and desire to retain them at least another term. A tax of $3,000,000 upon the people of the United States, divided among two hundred and ninety-two congressional districts, will lay upon each district the sum of $10,272. How many of you, if the people of your district should take a sordid view of the matter as every-day people whom I represent will be likely to, will be proud of your vote in behalf of this measure in your next canvass? Is there not sufficient food for thought in these suggestive figures to make you pause ere you increase the burden of taxation in your congressional district to the extent of $10,272? When that day of reckoning comes, as come it always does to members of this House biennially, is not here a ghost which no raving of yours can suppress, no more than Banquo's perturbed spirit would avaunt and quit the sight of Macbeth at his bidding.

Pardon me, Mr. Chairman. I know this is a very sordid and human outlook, not in keeping with this subject of American glorification, that I am taking. I know—

> There is a fierce gray bird with a bending beak,
> An angry eye, and a startling shriek,
> That nurses her brood where the cliff-flowers grow,
> On the precipice's height, in perpetual snow, and that this ornithological specimen ought not to be dethroned as the presiding genius of this debate. But, alas for humanity! My constituents, in the language of Holy Writ, are "of the earth earthy." They eat and drink, wear clothes, and pay taxes. They are materialists to a degree that would be painful and shocking to the eloquent gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.] Why, sir, give me the feeling heart, and the eloquent tongue, and all the gifts and prestige of that distinguished gentleman, and plant me down among the toiling farmers, artisans, merchants, and professional men of Kansas—they would confound me with the terrible words, "$10,272 to each congressional district," notwithstanding I painted the plumage of our national bird in colors so dazzling as to eclipse the rainbow.

I commend to every gentleman in this House, to the gentlemen from New York and Indiana especially, the lesson of these figures—10,272—in advance. They are mathematical characters, and it is the office of mathematics to give advance lessons. The astronomer, by the aid of mathematics names a hundred years in advance the minute when heavenly events will occur, but he counts with no greater precision than you can by the aid of this talismanic sesame, "$10,272," which opens the doors of a sure future retirement—in the event we vote for this bill—to you and me.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, firmly believing, as I do, that the passage of this bill is a violation of the good faith of Congress toward the people, in express terms and by agreement, always from the inception of this centennial movement by the act of March 3, 1871, and thence through all subsequent laws upon the subject—firmly believing that the country is nowise able to honestly expend the money in such a luxury, and that my constituents almost to a man would condemn the prodigality of the act, I shall vote to keep the centennial project within the bounds marked out by its early projectors and late curators—the field of voluntary contribution—and never consent to a forced loan of the people's money or goods for its erection or support. In doing so I know I shall aid to confine the Government within its legitimate sphere, and help to suppress the bane of another costly subsidy—how costly none can foretell if we shall once launch the ship of state into its seething and unfathomable waters.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] whose efforts in the direction of securing the very strictest economy in the administration of the Government, including his very efficient services in reducing our salaries as members of Congress, deserves at least the thanks of all those not injuriously affected by his efforts, spent much time on yesterday in showing that Congress heretofore has avoided incurring any responsibility in relation to the national centennial in the way of an appropriation, or for the payment of any expenses, debts, or obligations incurred by the corporation chartered by Congress providing for a commission to take charge of the exposition, and in showing that certain gentlemen on this floor and in the Senate gave a pledge that no appropriation should be asked of Congress in the future in aid of this great enterprise.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to admit all the gentleman has said as to this disavowal of responsibility by former Congresses, and as to the pledges made by the friends of the centennial at the inception and during the earlier history of the project. And I submit that all that has been said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] amounts absolutely to nothing as affecting the question of an appropriation now for the first time submitted to Congress. Ought the measure on its merits to be passed? Is the country in a condition to justify the voting of $3,000,000 to secure the success of the centennial? Is not the Government of the United States, looking to what has been done by Congress and the Executive, looking to the event to be celebrated, and the character of the centennial, bound, in justice to the interests of the people, its traditions, and the future of the country, to pass the pending measure and make this national celebration and exposition a success?

These are the questions we are to determine.

The argument to show that the United States is committed to make the exposition a success as a great national exposition by communications from the State Department to our foreign ministers, by their action, and by the acceptance of the invitation by different powers, was so ably and conclusively presented by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] that I will devote no time to the discussion of that point.

I had the pleasure at an early day of the present session of presenting to the House the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, approved on the 8th day of March, 1873, concerning the proposed national centennial:

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That our Senators be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to propose, advocate, and sustain by their votes such an appropriation by Congress for said centennial exhibition as may be necessary to make said proposed celebration thoroughly national and international, and worthy alike of the Government and people of the United States: Provided, That said appropriation shall not be given in aid of any corporation for that purpose.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing joint resolution, duly certified, be forwarded to our Senators and Representatives in Congress with the least avoidable delay.

I felt at the time I presented this resolution, before sectional jealousy or opposition to the idea of incorporating the international feature into the centennial had been fully developed, that there would be a generous emulation among the representatives of the people of the United States to excel each other in their efforts to make the centennial equal to the great occasion and creditable to the great nation and the great people whose patriotism inspired it, and whose skill, energies, and resources were so well calculated to secure its success.

I felt proud that my own State, by the action of its Legislature, was committed to the policy of an appropriation by Congress of an amount sufficient to make the centennial, in the language of the resolution, "thoroughly national and international, and worthy alike of the Government and people of the United States." I was gratified also, because from the very first moment that I heard of the design of bringing the people of the United States together on the occasion of the centennial anniversary of American independence, and of bringing together on the soil of the great Republic people from every country and clime on the earth, I felt the liveliest interest in the success of the great project. I looked forward to it as being in the interest of peace, progress, and development in our own country; as constituting an era that would mark the return of genuine kindly feeling among our own people, and in its character as an international gathering as being in the direction of promoting peace on earth and good will among the nations whose representatives would meet in the "City of Brotherly Love" and compete with us and with each other in an exhibition of their resources and the products of their skill and industry and their achievements in science and art.

I believed then, and I believe now, that with that generous aid and that co-operation on the part of our people which the centennial deserves, it will accomplish more for this country in the way of calling attention to our immense resources, developed and undeveloped, to our achievements in the great industries of the country, our progress in the arts and sciences, the excellencies and defects of our educational systems, and of utilizing and appropriating all that is excellent and superior in the useful inventions and discoveries of other nations, than could be accomplished by any other means that could possibly have been devised.

And more than all this, Mr. Chairman, I looked forward from the first to a national and international exposition at Philadelphia in 1876 as calculated to secure in the most efficient manner, after the unfortunate estrangement which has existed between our own people of different sections, that real union which is not only desirable but necessary to make us one people. I know, too, that this was the prevailing sentiment and feeling with many of the people of my own State, who had, as I think in an evil hour, to some extent forgotten their first love, forgotten the grand memories which cluster around the national ensign and the history of that grandest of all marches, the march of the people of this country from colonial dependence to the proud position they hold among the nations of the earth.

It may be insisted that the people who fought for four years to disrupt the Union, with a valor and determination worthy of a better cause, ought not to have deserted the flag of their country, and ought now to cherish national feelings and sentiments. While I never indulged for a moment in a feeling of sympathy with that most unjustifiable and disastrous movement which resulted in the bloodiest civil war that has occurred in modern times, I nevertheless cannot fail to realize the fact that a large majority who engaged in the struggle for the independence of the South were terribly in earnest; and though in the main they submit with becoming grace to the stern and inexorable logic of the situation, yet with many of them there is an absence of national feeling and national sentiment, of love for the flag whose bright folds they once looked on with pride and devotion, which lingers as one of the most unfortunate results of the bloody struggle.

Mr. Chairman, the great need of this country, I think the greatest, is the complete unification of our people. The efforts of the framers of the Constitution, which elicited the most intense thought, were directed toward harmonizing, under one comprehensive and just system of government, the conflicting interests which the jealousies of different sections, even then existing, suggested were difficult of settlement. The actual experiment under the system of government adopted and regulated by the Constitution has shown that the greatest danger to our institutions is that sectional jealousy and ill-feeling which come from a clash of interests. Nullification, or the attempted nullification, of the laws of the United States in 1832; the troubles in Kansas; and the terrible culmination of that sectional strife which slavery inspired, are illustrations of an irrepressible conflict between the sections which nothing less than a million of men in arms could adjust.

Slavery was destroyed, and with its utter destruction the main great cause of dangerous sectional difficulties was removed. Slavery perished, and the nation which its power had sought to destroy lived. In fact, the destruction of slavery exhibited the strength and vigor of the nation, and gave it new life and vigor even in the South. For the people of that section, scourged and impoverished as they have been, have had imparted to them a modicum of the hopefulness and promise which the new dispensation has inspired. Slavery was destroyed, the question of secession was settled, the integrity of the national Union was preserved, the reconstruction acts of Congress were enforced, and now every State in the Union is represented by its Senators and Representatives in Congress. The former slave is a citizen and a freeman; the system of labor in the South, broken up and deranged for a time, has, to a great extent, adjusted itself to meet the wants of a great producing section. The predictions of a class, who could see nothing in the future, under the changed condition of affairs in the South, but deterioration and decay, are met by the encouraging figures of the census of 1870.

But, Mr. Chairman, neither the success of the national arms nor the reconstruction acts, although the former brought the people of the South under the jurisdiction and power of the national Government and under the national flag and the latter brought them into practical relation to the Government, and thus restored the Union and those relations which they had sought to destroy and had disturbed, can secure that real union of feeling which is absolutely necessary to the prosperity of the country, nor bring the people back to their former devotion to the flag, or to feel a patriotic pride in the achievements of our Army and Navy in war, or those greater achievements of our people in time of peace. The people of every section of this great and rapidly growing country must be made to feel that it is their country, that the flag is their flag, that they have a part in the memories of the past and in the great future of this country; they must become thoroughly nationalized in feeling before we have a real, substantial, and permanent reunion.

Looking to the future, the people of the enterprising East and the progressive West are as much interested in this result being achieved as are the people of the other great section of the country. With our extensive and rapidly increasing railroad connections, bringing and destined to bring every portion of the country into close relation, the mutual dependence of each section upon every other is important and necessary to secure the prosperity of the whole country. Without complete unification, the extent of the country will, owing to the diversity of interests, endanger the success of our great experiment; with it, the variety of employments and the diversity and variety of productions will add to our common wealth, and secure a prosperity in which all sections have a common interest.

It has been frequently said, and I think there is much truth in the remark, that much of the prejudice entertained by the people of the North toward those of the South, and by the people of the South toward the people of the North, would be removed if they knew more of each other, and were more generally and frequently brought in contact with each other in social as well as in business and commercial relations. They see each other mainly in the columns of bitter partisan newspapers and in the speeches of politicians, who seek to keep alive and foment the bitterness of sectional animosities.

There never was a finer illustration of the beneficial effects of social relationships between persons from different sections of the country than we have witnessed in this House during this session of the Forty-third Congress. Differences—wide differences upon political questions; differences in habits and tastes and modes of thought, so far as these are produced by different surroundings of members coming from every portion of the country—do not seem to have disturbed the cordial and friendly feelings which have characterized the members in their association with each other.

Would not the centennial in 1876, sustained and made successful by a liberal support from the national Treasury, thus giving it a national stamp and relieving it of a local or sectional character, contribute very powerfully to heal the wounds and remove the bitterness which a fratricidal strife has left? Would it not inaugurate an era of good feeling among our people of every section? Would it not kindle again in the hearts of the people a fresh devotion to the country, a more intense, genuine patriotism? Would it not add to the appreciation of the blessings of civil and religious liberty which we enjoy, and fix more firmly in the hearts of the people that sentiment which makes millions rally round the flag of the country when the nation's life or its honor is imperiled?

If these results are likely to be accomplished need we debate the question as to whether these results will be worth $3,000,000? The amount, though large, sinks into insignificance in comparison with the value of such an achievement. The suggestion that Congress has no constitutional power to vote money to the centennial, with all deference to those who take this position, has, I think, nothing in it. It might be difficult to find a warrant in the Constitution for the vote we gave unanimously a few days since in aid of the sufferers by the flood in the delta of the Mississippi River. But no one will ever question the right to make this appropriation; and certainly no question will ever be made thereon before the only department of the Government which can declare the act unconstitutional. I submit, however, that the power to make the appropriation to the centennial is found in the preamble to the Constitution, wherein the people of the United States declared that they ordained and established the Constitution, among other things, to promote the general welfare, and in the eighth section of the first article of that instrument, in which, among other specially enumerated powers vested in Congress, the power to provide for the general welfare of the United States is found.

And as to the proposition that the appropriation should not be made because of our poverty or because of the heavy load of debt which hangs over us, I beg to say that all the arguments of gentlemen on this floor, who, affected by the economical epidemic which has swept away a portion of our salaries, and which under its inspiration would bring our public improvements to a dead lock, have failed to convince me of our extreme poverty. It was shown by an able writer (Mr. Parton) that the stone coal at the back-door of the city of Pittsburgh at two dollars per ton would pay the national debt twenty-seven times over. The resources of our widely extended country are simply incalculable. The wealth of my own State in coal, iron, copper, and marble, now hidden in the earth awaiting the magic touch of capital, enterprise, and labor to bring it forth as an accretion to the wealth of the country, would astonish the most hopeful and extravagant, and bring more than a realization of the wildest dreams as to the future wealth of Tennessee ever indulged in by any one of her people.

It is said we are too poor to make this appropriation, because our expenditures for a time have exceeded our receipts, and because we owe a heavy national debt. I cannot controvert and will not attempt to controvert what is shown by the figures in relation to this matter. But I submit that if the fact that we owe a heavy national debt, and that our expenditures for a time have exceeded our receipts, is to be taken as conclusive of our impoverished condition, we would stop short in the construction of necessary public improvements or in making any appropriations except those actually required to carry on the operations of Government. If a proposition was introduced to erect a public building actually and urgently needed, actually and urgently required by the operations of the Government and the demands of a growing business and commerce in the locality where it was proposed to erect the Government building, could it be urged, would it be contended, that the entire national debt should be paid before the appropriation was made? Would a deficiency in the receipts and disbursements of the Treasury for a particular fiscal year justify us stopping the development of wealth and the march of the car of progress until there should be a surplus in the Treasury? I have heard much during this session of Congress as to the extreme poverty of the United States. I do not believe a word of it. No limit can be fixed upon the productive energies of the people of the United States. While they were conducting a war of gigantic proportions, requiring hundreds of millions and billions of dollars, they spanned the continent with a railroad connecting the Mississippi Valley with the Pacific Ocean.

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means on yesterday, while the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] was speaking of the country having raised daily during the late war for months $4,000,000 from its resources, asked that gentleman if he recognized borrowing as one of our resources. I tell the gentleman that the enormous amount necessary to carry on the war was furnished by the people of the United States, and that the loan was based on the ability of this country to pay it, the confidence of the people in their own Government, and that this borrowing did exhibit the resources of the country as they have never yet been exhibited. Tennessee is largely interested in having her immensely rich resources developed. She is deeply interested in promoting the success of the centennial, if from no higher motive, in order that she may avail herself of so fine an opportunity of calling the attention of the country and the civilized world to her genial climate, her minerals, the products of her fields and forests, her manufactories, and the achievements of her industrious and skillful artisans. Every other State and Territory is interested in this enterprise in a greater or less degree.

European governments seem inclined to exhibit sympathy in the cause of labor and science. The United States ought for a stronger reason to be true to its principles and its devotion to the interests and elevation of labor and the promotion of universal progress. If we are satisfied that the centennial will secure the grand results at which I have barely had time to glance, ought we not to vote the measure now proposed?

Mr. Chairman, I conclude with a brief notice of the objection to the incorporation of the international feature in the proposed centennial anniversary, that there is something incompatible or inconsistent in having the great Republic, the champion of republicanism, invite the people throughout the world, hailing from monarchies and despotisms, to meet with us in the celebration of the anniversary of the birth of freedom in the New World and the organization of this Government of the people.

But this objection is based I think mainly on the assumption that the centennial is to be simply a Fourth of July celebration. If the design is carried out the exposition is to last for months, and while the people from all parts of the United States on the 4th of July, 1876, may appropriately, and will no doubt with full and grateful and patriotic hearts, celebrate the day which will have returned a hundred times with its stirring associations and memories, that celebration, on that particular day, will only be an episode in the history of the great gathering. Did any American, filled with devotion to the principles of the great free Republic of the United States, when he visited Vienna in 1873, object to the pageant on the occasion of the meeting of William of Germany with his kingly cousin of Austria, or take offense at the playing of the Austrian national hymn? He expected this when he went to Vienna, and, Mr. Chairman, he found himself as I did when I heard that national anthem, filled with patriotic emotion, because the sentiment of devotion to country is one that thrills even the heart of a foreigner who loves his own country and its institutions. And thousands who visit America in 1876, differing widely with us in governmental ethics, instead of being offended at what they may see or hear on the occasion of the national centennial, will catch that spirit which our national hymns and this national demonstration will most certainly inspire.

I feel that I have not presented to the House anything new or much in the way of argument to show that the measure now pending should be passed and the success of the centennial secured by our action, but I have at least presented the subject generally as I desired to present it, and have expressed the sentiments and feelings which animate me in supporting the measure.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this bill, if passed, will appropriate the sum of $3,000,000 to the world's fair at Philadelphia in 1876. That is the sum asked for in the bill. Whether that great amount will be all that will be asked for is, to say the least, problematical. A few weeks ago it was said that the smallest amount which would be required would be a million or two more than that. But a sort of green and yellow sickness seemed to come over this centennial show business, and, perhaps as a matter of policy, its sponsors on this floor and the patriotic lobby outside appear to have come to the conclusion that they had better moderate their demands on the Federal Treasury. So now they gently ask us for what appears to be regarded in their eyes as the pitiful little sum of $3,000,000.

Well, suppose we give it to them, what assurance will we have that that will be the end of the matter in the way of appropriations? Suppose after the money is expended, after the manner of other magnificent projectors, these gentlemen come back to us and tell us that the money is all gone, that it was found to be insufficient, that the show, instead of being an honor and a credit to the country, will be a miserable and disgraceful failure, and to save the country from the humiliation of having a wretched abortion, instead of a magnificent success, it will be necessary to appropriate a few millions more. I say suppose that, and then imagine the deep-toned pathos of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and the soul-stirring appeals of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] and can you suppose for one instant that Congress will fail to unlock the Treasury and permit the gentlemen in charge of the great and costly display of the nation's patriotism and vanity, from taking the other necessary millions?

Why, I understand that a year or two ago, when this great folly was first proposed, it was solemnly protested that Congress should never be called on for one dollar; and it was even allowed to be put in the first bill on the subject that the national Government should never have to pay one dollar. Such were the protestations then. Now it is "Give us this poor three millions, and we will never ask for a cent more." Such is always the way. But I trust it is not impertinent softly to suggest to the champions of this measure that they are making a huge draught on the credulity of this House. Our experience on this very question ought to warn us what we may expect. If in 1872 nothing was ever to be asked, and in 1874 three millions are asked, what is it probable will be demanded in 1876? No, sir; let us not deceive ourselves. You are about to enter on an expenditure which is much more likely to end with seven or ten millions than with three.

But, sir, $3,000,000 is no insignificant sum. During the war and since the war, members of Congress have been in the habit of passing acts appropriating such immense sums that we have come to regard a few millions, more or less, as a mere bagatelle. Our notions have grown to be very magnificent. But after all $1,000,000 is a great sum of money and represents a vast amount of toil, and when paid into the public Treasury a vast amount of deprivation and discomfort to chose who earn the money by hard work and save it by rigid economy. It is time, high time, that Congress was beginning to appretiate the fact that hereafter the Government must be run on a moderate and economical scale. If we do not understand and act in that spirit our successors will.

I trust, Mr. Chairman, that I appreciate as fully as any of the gentlemen who have spoken the significance of the great historical act which it is proposed to celebrate. The declaration of independence was a great event in human history, and I am pursuaded that as the years roll away that great act will be honored more and more. It was the beginning of a new and better era in human affairs. It established the rights and equality before the law, not only in this country, but I trust ultimately throughout the world, of all men I believe that equality of rights will not only be found consistent with, but conducive to better government and a better civilization. I permit no man to bestow a higher meed of praise on the statesmen of 1776 and their great work than I do.

So, likewise, I think I duly appreciate the mighty stride our country has made in the century which is about closing; in the creation of wealth, in the development of power, in art, science, and in literature. The result of the first century of the government of a great nation under the republican form is one to which we may well point with pride and exultation. We have proved by the success of a hundred years that law and order can be as perfectly maintained, that life and liberty and property can be made as secure under republican institutions as under any form of government ever instituted among men; that such a government may be strong for all the purposes of peace and all the necessities of war; that it may be loved at home and respected abroad; that under it religion, morals, education, culture in all its forms may expand and flourish. That is our great trophy. That is our grand achievement. Such a possibility had for two thousand years been a speculation; to-day it is a demonstration. Philosophers had reasoned upon it, philanthropists had hoped for it, poets had dreamed about it, skeptics had doubted it, despots had denied it. American statesmanship has established it, and American virtue and wisdom have maintained and vindicated it. That is worth celebrating. It should be celebrated in every city, in every hamlet, in every home, and in every heart. Painting, poetry, sculpture, music, eloquence, every form of expression of patriotic emotion, of thankfulness for the past and of hope for the future, will aid in the fitting and proper celebration of the great event and the triumph of the great idea.

But a show—a world's show—where we will bring our hogs and cattle, our mules and our asses, our goats and our dogs—I quote from the adopted schedules—our "hunting dogs," our "watch dogs," our "coach dogs," "and all other varieties of dogs," including, I suppose—

> Mongrel, puppy, whelp, and hound,
> And curs of low degree.

We are to bring to the mighty show our "turtles, terrapins, frogs, &c." And there are to be our "wild cats" and our "wolves from the Western States," picturesquely mingled with our fruits and vegetables, our manufactures of wood, and iron, and cloth, and the products of our mines: and we are to ask all the world, at a cost of many millions, to come and gaze and wonder and admire. All this seems to me inappropriate, if not vulgar. The Fourth of July, 1876, ought to be a feast of gladness to all our people. If you will let them alone, and avoid the blighting effect of governmental interference, that it will be so kept cannot be doubted. In every city and village, in every valley, and on every hill where our people live throughout the length and breadth of the Republic, they will find fit and proper modes to express the feelings of their hearts. Such a commemoration will be spontaneous and sincere. It will cheer the hearts of the old with the consciousness of the fact that they have helped maintain the faith of the fathers. It will inspire the hearts of the young with the resolve that they in their turn, will transmit the Republic and its hopes untarnished to their children.

If the people of any city or town choose to show their patriotism by holding a fair, by all means let them do so. But I trust we will not after to-day hear of any men, of any city coming to Congress and asking unknown millions of the public treasure to aid in their display of patriotism, by getting up a huge meretricious display in imitation, and most probably weak imitation at that, of Louis Napoleon and of Francis Joseph.

Mr. Chairman, there are many objections to this scheme. This expenditure, if made, would be entirely extra-governmental. It has no possible connection with the legislative, executive, or judicial departments of the Government. It will in no way aid the Government in the proper discharge of any of its duties. Neither the Army nor the Navy, our foreign relations nor our Indian affairs, nor any other thing of which the Government has proper jurisdiction, or for the faithful administration of which it is justly responsible, can derive any benefit whatever from this great expenditure of public money.

I know it has grown to be a sort of fashion to sneer at any person who doubts the power or policy of the Government to do anything, or expend any sum, for purposes wholly foreign from the legitimate and strict duties properly pertaining to its functions. All that seems to be necessary, in the opinion of many men, is to find something which they suppose it is desirable, or to their personal interests to have done, and they forthwith begin to besiege the Federal Treasury for the necessary funds with which to do it. It may be as foreign to any of the proper duties of Government as the moon, but, on the plea that it would be a "good thing," and that the means to do it can be raised in no other way, siege is laid to the Treasury, batteries are planted, re-enforcements are sent for, regular approaches are made, the press is subsidized, the lobbies are invoked, and they always rush from Philadelphia or elsewhere. And it is wonderful what a disinterested and patriotic set of fellows these gentlemen are! How cheerfully they spend their time and money, without pay and without price! With what pleasing and persuasive eloquence they descant on the immeasurable and universal advantage that is to result to everybody from the adoption of the scheme proposed! It is absolutely bewildering to the comprehension of a country member to hear them talk. If Congress will only give them the keys of the Treasury to take out a few millions, more or less, the world is to suddenly become far richer, happier, and wiser. Sometimes it is said that social blandishments, gentle insinuations, flattery, delicious to the congressional heart, and, before the temperance movement, even wine and cigars, have aided in the good work.

It may be that on extraordinary occasions and in desperate emergencies even the wives of members of Congress are called into the service, and all the ten thousand appliances and inventions and contrivances known to expert managers are brought into requisition to get money out of the Treasury for no purpose under heaven beneficial to the Government in any of its departments, or useful to it in the discharge of any of its duties.

Such schemes are always to be distrusted and avoided as far as possible. Government is instituted to perform certain duties. Mainly those duties are strictly defined; they are generally clearly understood. For the purpose of discharging those duties taxes are levied and collected. And it is a violation of the spirit of the fundamental law, and of good faith toward the people, when those taxes are expended for purposes other than those for which they are specifically collected.

I do not undertake to say that this scheme is by any means the first one of this kind which has ever been before Congress; I do not undertake to say that many such schemes have not passed; but I do say, that in my knowledge of the history of the country I know of no expenditure of public money for purposes wholly extra-governmental ever proposed which approached this in the magnitude of the amount asked. A few thousands may have been given for such purposes here or there, but for this we are asked for millions, with at least a fair prospect of being asked for millions more.

Mr. Chairman, this expenditure would be bad in itself under any circumstances, very bad. But, sir, it is particularly bad as a precedent. In the years to come it would be quoted as a precedent, and an authority and an excuse for other expenditures wholly unjustifiable under any true conception of the nature or objects of government or of constitutional authorization. It would be made the fulcrum on which the lever would be placed to pry open the doors of the Treasury in the interest of schemes of public expenditure, if it be possible, even less meritorious than this.

Is not this a good time to call a halt on this sort of legislation? Within a few years we have passed through a great and destructive war. In that war the savings of the labor of half a generation perished. Our country North and South is filled with a maimed soldiery. Widows and orphan children, a legacy of our great civil strife, are to be found in every neighborhood. Every sentiment of gratitude to the dead, and of faithfulness to the living, demand, while these classes live and want, their wants should be supplied by a generous hand. Our public debt is more than $2,000,000,000. Two of our great cities have recently been almost destroyed by fire, and at this moment it is said, almost two hundred thousand of our fellow-citizens, living on the banks of the Mississippi, have been driven in poverty and wretchedness from their homes by the floods.

Our currency is largely depreciated, we are still unable to fulfill our solemn and often-repeated promises. We are still suffering from one of the greatest financial convulsions which ever swept over our land. Thousands and tens of thousands of our people are still out of employment, living on stinted fare or on charity. Our people are sorely oppressed with heavy taxes. Every breeze that comes to us brings a menacing growl of discontent. We are admonished by every consideration of justice, and by every consideration of mercy, to avoid all expenditures not absolutely necessary, to cut down every expenditure which can be cut down, and to take off every burden which can be taken off. Let us do this vigilantly, relentlessly, and it may be fairly hoped that when the sun rises from the Atlantic to greet the Republic on its great anniversary, he will shine on a happy, prosperous, thankful, jubilant people.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Chairman, I have been listening to this debate for the last day and a half, and have been grouping in my mind whatever facts I found entirely beyond dispute, in the hope that by such grouping I might be able to determine my own action upon the measure before the committee. In the first place, it is a fact that this country on the 4th of July, 1876, will see its one hundredth birthday; and I gather from everything that has been said, including the speech just made, that there is nothing in all its history for the past hundred years, in its marvelous progress in arts and sciences and literature, in its growth in wealth and population, in its wonderful development in agriculture and manufactures, in its steadfast, faithful adherence to the great underlying principles of the Republic—I say there is nothing that should compel the American people in shame or in sorrow or humility to refuse to celebrate this birthday.

It is a fact, sir, that the Declaration of Independence was prepared, signed, and promulgated in the city of Philadelphia; and that settles beyond peradventure or cavil as to where this celebration shall be held, if anywhere. It is a fact that Congress in March, 1871, provided for a centennial celebration, and by the same act provided that it should be an international exhibition of arts, &c. It is also a fact that the President of the United States, in obedience to that law, sent forth his proclamation to the world, using language which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, in conformity with the provisions of the act of Congress aforesaid, do hereby declare and proclaim that there will be held in the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, to be opened on the 19th day of April, 1876, and to be closed on the 19th of October, in the same year; and in the interest of peace, civilization, and domestic and international friendship and intercourse, I commend the celebration and exhibition to the people of the United States; and in behalf of this Government and people I cordially commend them to all nations who may be pleased to take part therein.

Mr. FRYE. It is a further fact that the Secretary of State, instructed by the same law, sent this proclamation of the President to all the diplomatic representatives of all the world, expressing the trust that they would make known its contents to their people and invite them to co-operate in the celebration. It is a fact, as I have gathered from this discussion, that thirteen or fourteen foreign countries who received that invitation to unite in the celebration have in terms accepted it.

My colleague from Maine [Mr. HALE] says there has been no invitations—there has been no acceptance of any invitation. In Heaven's name, gentlemen, you heard that declaration of the President read, you know what the Secretary of State has said, and you heard Bismarck's acceptance read in this House yesterday; and if that does not constitute invitation and acceptance, are there any words in the English language which can be used which shall make an invitation and acceptance?

It is a fact, sir, that the same law provided for, and the President appointed, a centennial commission, men of judgment, men of discretion, men in whom the whole country have confidence; and that in obedience to the law that commission reported from time to time progress to the President of the United States; that in February last they made their last report, which is before the House here to-day; and the President of the United States sent that report to this House, and accompanied it by a message, which I desire the Clerk to read on account of the crisp, cogent manner of putting the case.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have the honor herewith to submit the report of the centennial commissioners, and to add a word in the way of recommendation.

There have now been international expositions held by three of the great powers of Europe. It seems fitting that the one-hundredth anniversary of our independence should be marked by an event that will display to the world the growth and progress of a nation devoted to freedom, and to the pursuit of fame, fortune, and honors by the lowest citizen as well as the highest. A failure in this enterprise would be deplorable. Success can be assured by arousing public opinion to the importance of the occasion. To secure this end, in my judgment, congressional legislation is necessary to make the exposition both national and international.

The benefits to be derived from a successful international exposition are manifold. It will necessarily be accompanied by expenses beyond the receipts from the exposition itself; but they will be compensated for many fold by the commingling of people from all sections of our own country; by bringing together the people of different nationalities; by bringing into juxtaposition, for ready examination, our own and foreign skill and progress in manufactures, agriculture, art, science, and civilization.

The selection of the site for the exposition seems to me appropriate, from the fact that one hundred years before the date fixed for the exposition the Declaration of Independence, which launched us into the galaxy of nations as an independent people, emanated from the same spot.

We have much in our varied climate, soil, mineral products, and skill of which advantage can be taken by other nationalities to their profit. In return they will bring to our shores works of their skill, and familiarize our people with them, to the mutual advantage of all parties.

Let us have a complete success in our centennial exposition, or suppress it in its infancy, acknowledging our inability to give it the international character to which our self-esteem aspires.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 25, 1874.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Chairman, the President says "a failure in this enterprise would be deplorable," and the commission in the performance of their duty have said to the House and the President of the United States, "Owing to great financial distress and panics we find it is impossible to raise the money as we expected, and unless there is congressional aid the enterprise will be a failure." And there is the position of it before this House to-day. Our Executive says that a failure in the enterprise would be deplorable, and our commission say if they have no congressional aid failure is an absolute certainty.

Now, sir, in view of this state of the question, what is it my duty as a representative of the people of the United States to do in these premises? Ah! sir, there is but one door open for me. I say a failure would be deplorable; not only that, it would be dishonorable. It would dishonor this great nation in the eyes of the whole world, and we should admit the dishonor was beyond our power to avert.

There may be one other reply, one other door open, intimated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] in his inquiry to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN;] intimated by my colleague from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] from the Committee on Appropriations; intimated by the gentleman who last spoke, [Mr. SMITH, of Ohio;] and intimated, too, by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. COBB,] and that is, that this nation of ours is bankrupt. Bankrupt, is it? The New York Tribune, of last Saturday, contains the following:

The national revenue since the beginning of the calendar year has been several millions less than it was in the corresponding months of last year, yet the public debt has been reduced nearly one million more in the first four months of 1874 than it was in the same months of 1873. The figures are as follows:

Reduction of the public debt.

Months.	1874.	1873.
January	$1,845,211 76	$406,243 18
February	2,590,047 45	5,277,880 77
March	2,189,338 46	1,644,058 97
April	2,965,451 43	2,247,485 60
Net decrease	9,590,049 10	8,763,182 16

And our 5 per cent. bonds are quoted both in London and in New York at from 1 to 2 per cent. above par in gold, exclusive of accrued interest. What a commentary on bankruptcy! We are a bankrupt nation, they intimate; and where would the money come from, they ask? Why, gentlemen, do you fail to remember when you required $4,000,000 a day the money came from the people? Do you fail to remember, too, that the strong men who fought your battles came from the people—from the same place your money did—and that it was to sustain the country? If you go to the same people, to the same men, the men who labor day by day to support their families, and ask them where the money will come from to save the honor of our great Republic, they will tell you where it will come from—from their hard earnings, where it did before. Let the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] go down into his own district, and let him ask the poorest fisherman there who plies his craft between old Sam Patch's and the eastward shore and ask him where the money will come from to save the faith of the nation, and he will tell him, "I will give to-day's catch, and if that is not enough I will throw my boat into the bargain."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I think they would rather pay the national debt, from what I know of those fishermen.

Mr. FRYE. They would a little rather the Ways and Means Committee would provide some way by which the four or five million dollars of taxes due from rich corporations in this country, and which from the day they were assessed down to now they have kept in their pockets, should be collected to go toward the payment of the national debt.

But, sir, as I said, I see no escape for me but to support this bill, unless it is true that we are bankrupt. We have forty millions of people, with measureless sea-coast, with rivers and lakes and canals, with a net-work of railways, manufactures, agriculture, fertile prairies of the West; mines of iron, coal, copper, silver, and gold; commerce and ship-building just springing into new life and activity; with these and all the other boundless resources of a great nation, and yet we are told the nation is bankrupt and cannot pay $3,000,000 to save itself from disgrace in the eyes of the world. Can it be so? That kind of talk may commend itself to the Committee on Appropriations, but they will have hard work to convince the people that we are bankrupt when they pass appropriation bills to provide for paying a boy to brush our coats sixty dollars a month, a man to open the door eighteen hundred dollars for every five months' work, and a man to kick his heels against the marble floors below from sixteen to nineteen hundred dollars a year—hard work to convince the people that we are bankrupt when only a year ago they were appropriating millions of dollars for a public building in Chicago, whose Representatives here to-day will not vote for an appropriation of $3,000,000 to save the country from discredit; and millions in New York, and millions in Boston, and millions all over the country, only a year ago. If we are bankrupt to-day these two committees are wise, and they must by looking into the future have seen it then as well as now.

The door of bankruptcy then, sir, in my judgment, is not open to me to march through. I have to step back to the only door that is open. I see on the one hand disgrace to my country, and on the other hand I see my country clothed with new power and new glory among the nations of the earth, by celebrating this anniversary as it has been provided for.

Now, sir, I am aware that when a man talks about the country or the flag, gentlemen sitting around him say, "O, he has started the American eagle." When my eloquent friend from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] makes a rounded period and says a word for his country, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COBB] says, "O, he has let loose his eagle;" and other economical gentlemen in the house say, "O, see his flight." Now, sir, notwithstanding this, I have no hesitation in saying that to me my country is precious. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] laughs as if it was not; and I do not wonder at it, for he proposes to make it otherwise by voting against this bill. The country to me is precious, and it is a thousand times more precious than it was ten years ago. It went through the fire and is purified. It was sanctified in tears and in prayers. It has been baptized in blood. It was unjust and despotic; it is now just and paternal. It was divided and sectional; it is to-day united. The fraternal feelings manifested on this floor every day that we sit here prove it. The interchange of courtesies between the men who wore the Army blue and the men who wore the confederate gray prove it. The noble words of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] delivered in eulogy of Charles Sumner on the floor of this House, prove it. And under Almighty God I believe that this gathering of our countrymen together on the 4th of July, 1876, at Philadelphia, will cement that Union and make it more enduring than the eternal hills.

If this is sentimentalism let some of these gentlemen who have blood like the blood of the turnip call it so. I must be a sentimentalist. When I see the flag sometimes I feel my blood tingle from my feet to the crown of my head, and am not ashamed to be thought sentimental. When I heard of the defeat of our soldiers at Bull Run I wept, and was not ashamed of the tears because some cold-blooded man might charge me with being a sentimentalist. When Abraham Lincoln died I wept, and did not hide my face. When Lee surrendered I wept and laughed, and hurrahed, too, like a boy. And I did not hush my voice or hide my face for fear I should be called a sentimentalist with the eagle let loose.

I tell you, gentlemen of this House, if we all of us looked at the eagle and the honor and the credit of our country more than we look at the seats we occupy and ask ourselves whether or not we shall ever again occupy them, our country would stand at least as well as she stands to-day. Why, sir, the other day there was a bill before this House in which the gentlemen of the West felt the deepest interest. They urged its passage by every argument and every appeal, on behalf, as they said, of the necessities of the West. Now, sir, I love the West. I have always loved the West. There is an energy and a courage and a dash in the people of the West that always takes my fancy; and in this matter my sympathies were with them, but I did not vote with them. I talked against their bill. I endeavored to obtain the floor to speak against it here. Why? Because there was much inflation in the bill? By no manner of means. Because I believed that my country could not pay every dollar her printing-press prints? By no manner of means. But, sir, because I felt that the faith of the country had been plighted, and that a step away from that plighted faith involved dishonor to the country. And, sir, the people of my section and of many other portions of the country applauded the President of the United States because he vetoed that bill. And why? They said it saved the credit of the nation. And the same gentlemen who applauded that act, to-day, when he sends his message here and tells you that the failure of the enterprise will be deplorable, that it rests upon you to say whether or not it shall fail say, "Let it fail;" and I suppose would also say, besides, "Let the honor of the nation look out for itself, while we look out for our seats."

Now, sir, I propose, so far as I am concerned, to look out for the honor of the nation in all measures under any and all circumstances whatsoever. Sir, what shall be said to Bismarck? What letter are you going to instruct your Secretary of State to send him in reply to the acceptance which was read yesterday by my colleague from Maine? Why I suppose that if the gentlemen opposed to this bill have their way they will instruct the Secretary of State to write to him in this manner: "My dear sir, the American people instruct me to say that they are delighted with the kind expressions used in your acceptance of the invitation which our President sent to you to join in our international exhibition, but"——

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. Not until I get through with the letter that I am writing. "But, sir, I am also desired to say in behalf of the American people that some citizens of Pennsylvania, and of Philadelphia especially, cheated by false pretenses the intelligent American Congress into passing a law under which the President intelligently issued this proclamation. I am instructed further to say that our finances are in a deplorable condition, that we are called upon to pay $3,000,000 to entertain you as our guest, and that we cannot by any possibility do it, and if we could, I am instructed to say further (that instruction comes from my colleague from Maine) that the people of Pennsylvania, having cheated us by false pretenses once, will make a raid on us by and by, and that if we invite you here now and pay this $3,000,000, cheated by these wicked Pennsylvanians, we should be compelled to pay $9,000,000 more."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That would be a pretty good letter.

Mr. FRYE. I have no doubt, according to the sentiments of the gentleman from Maine, it would be a dignified letter for one great nation to send to another.

Mr. DAWES. There is no eagle in it.

Mr. FRYE. No; there is no eagle in that letter at all, and if the gentleman from Massachusetts has his way we shall need no eagle again. But that reminds me that there would have to be another letter written which was suggested to me by the speech of my colleague. There was, according to him, only one power worth noticing that had been invited and had accepted, and that was Germany. What kind of a letter shall you write to those little fellows like the Netherlands? I suppose you will instruct your Secretary of State to write something like this: "Sir, the American Congress instruct me to say that while they admit you have had something of a history among the nations of the earth, yet you are to-day small and insignificant and hardly worthy of the notice of a great people like ours, and I am instructed to say to you that the invitation which you accepted of the President of the United States is hereby withdrawn." And so with the rest of the powers one after the other. And you expect the American people to allow you to clip the wings of their eagle in that way, do you? Now if the gentleman from Kansas desires to ask me a question I will hear it.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. The gentleman has given us two or three letters. I would like him to tell me what sort of a letter he will write to the people relative to the acts of Congress of 1871 and 1872 which said that this exhibition never should be a charge against them. I would further like to know if he would embody in that letter the fact that you may break faith with the American people in any way, but you must keep it with foreign princes.

Mr. FRYE. I heard yesterday from my colleague—and I give him credit for being one of the ablest men on the floor of this House, and he is my personal friend and I listened to him with a great deal of interest; I am answering the gentleman's question—I heard a history of forty minutes in length about this enterprise, when it was born, what swaddling clothes were placed upon it, in what cradle it was rocked, who was the nurse, who the father and who the mother.

I say now to the gentleman from Kansas that not one single word of that whole history is applicable in any possible way to the question now before this Congress. Those were all secrets of the Chamber in which the babe was born, and not one word of that history ever went to the world. I am dealing with those facts which were by authority sent abroad to all the nations of the earth through their diplomatic representatives; what took place in our own silent Chamber cannot affect the position at all.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. But are not the statutes of the United States a child full born and created, the creature of the people, whether the statements made here belong to them or not? I had supposed that the acts of the American Congress of every character were the people's.

Mr. FRYE. What are you doing? Are you asking me a question or making another speech? The gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] yesterday replied to this very question which has been asked me by the gentleman from Kansas to-day. The acts of Congress, sir, nowhere admit of the interpretation which the gentleman puts upon them. Under those bills there should be no liability imposed. Under those bills there has been no liability imposed. This is a measure brought before Congress alone by itself, and the honor of the people rests upon this measure now here before us and upon the public circumstances, those which have been proclaimed to the nations of the earth by the express authority of law.

Mr. Chairman, I did not when I commenced propose to talk half the time I have, and I have but a word or two more to say. If I should vote against this bill I should be untrue to myself and untrue to my constituents, I believe. But say gentlemen here: "Your constituents are opposed to this; my constituents are opposed to this." I tell you, gentlemen, your constituents under a mistake of facts, under misrepresentation, under misconception of circumstances, may for aught I know be opposed to it; but I do not believe they are. My people are patriotic, laborious, I admit; economical, I admit. But they know what the country cost; they know how precious a thing it is, and before they would allow the honor of their country to be tarnished, every patriotic man and woman throughout the district would give a day's work, ay, or a month's work, if you come to that. Do you suppose that they would refuse to pay the paltry sum of eight cents each, which this bill calls for, for the same holy purpose? I know they will not.

A distinguished member of this House, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, only one year ago to-morrow, in Philadelphia, in the speech which he made giving in his adhesion fully and completely to this international exhibition, giving his opinion that the Congress of the United States would contribute whatever might be necessary to make it a success, said of his own State what I will read:

> In my own State of Maine a very lively interest is manifested; and I am sure that at the proper time a liberal appropriation will be made, as will be the case with the other States.

I say with him that Maine will be alive to this matter, and that all the States in the Union will be alive to it. I dare go to my constituents voting for this measure, and I dare not go to them voting against it. But suppose they are to-day against it, then what? Am I bound to do what my constituents command me to do, nothing more, nothing less? Is that the place I occupy on this floor? Am I entitled to no manly independence whatever? When I come to the Congress of the United States am I compelled to drop manhood, and upon every vote, or every word, or every letter, send down to my constituents and feel of their pulse in order that I may know what they will say or think of it? Sir, they elected me their Representative in the Congress of the United States, and when they did that they clothed me with power not alone to represent them, but to be a representative of my whole country, from the North to the South, from the East to the West. And if they should demand of me with one voice to-day that which I believe was a discredit and a dishonor to my country, I would say to them, with all respect, "I will not do the wicked thing."

I honor my constituents. They are honest, patriotic, and intelligent, and ordinarily their expressed will would be my law. But must I cast every vote in fear and trembling, lest I cross their unexpressed will? Would they honor the coward who represented them?

I know my constituents well, almost every man personally. They know me, and I am willing to go to them on the record I make here to-day. If they hide their faces from me and say, "You have been an unfaithful servant," I must submit for the time and let the future set me right. But I think they will give me credit for honesty of purpose, they will give me credit for a warm heart and warm blood, and will believe that whatever I do is done conscientiously, from pure motives, and with an ardent love for our common country. Though they may believe I did wrong, they will forgive me and say, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

Mr. GUNCKEL. Mr. Chairman, I have several Fourth of July orations, but as I did not anticipate any use for them in Congress, I left them at home. I hope I shall, therefore, be pardoned if in the remarks I make on this bill I say nothing of "our great and glorious country" and "the Star Spangled Banner," nothing of the American eagle or E pluribus unum, but come at once to the plain, practical question, whether Congress should pass this bill and so appropriate $3,000,000 to the centennial exhibition enterprise. In the West we believe in the Fourth of July, and always celebrate it, but, in our homely phrase, "we foot our own bills." We never thought of getting the General Government to pay the expenses or of asking a subsidy for such a purpose, and must be excused if we think it a little strange that anybody else should ask a subsidy for a Fourth of July celebration.

The first question that would naturally arise is whether there be any warrant in the Constitution by which Congress may make an appropriation of $3,000,000 for this centennial exhibition. It is somewhat singular that of the two distinguished members of the Committee on the Judiciary, and of the four eminent lawyers who have spoken upon this question, no one has even alluded to this all-important question. They must have known, and full well, that there was a serious constitutional question involved; that it had been raised by some of the most distinguished lawyers in the United States in the discussion in the Senate a few weeks ago. Why, then, have they not been pleased to enlighten the House on this subject? I call upon those who shall follow me to point out the particular clause of the Constitution under which Congress is empowered to make this appropriation, and to present such argument to my good friends on the other side, who have been in the habit of regarding the Constitution as an instrument to be strictly construed, as shall warrant Congress to exercise this new and extraordinary power. I do not propose to argue the constitutional question at this time; I merely want to suggest that there is a grave constitutional question involved which cannot be ignored. I may be answered that the power has been already exercised by Congress, and recently by legislation for the relief of those suffering from the inundation of the Mississippi. In such extraordinary claims upon our sympathy and humanity no one may have cared to raise the question; although it was raised in the Forty-second Congress, and relief to those suffering from the Boston fire refused on this very ground. But here it is raised, and the learned gentlemen on the other side must meet it, and meet it boldly and squarely.

But, sir, passing from that and coming to the question of expediency, to the question whether this Government is in a good condition to appropriate $3,000,000 for a mere celebration, a mere show, dignified though it may be by the high-sounding title of "international exhibition," I think the matter was well put yesterday by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR.] I must say that his question was the best question, and the answer of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] the poorest answer, that I ever heard in all my life. I beg to put them on record, to show that lawyers are often better at asking than answering questions:

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question? I wish to ask him where he proposes to get this money, consistently with the pledges of the United States, with the public debt increased $2,000,000 in the last year, and with no provision for a sinking fund; and whether he thinks it becoming in anybody to borrow money to celebrate his birthday?

Mr. TREMAIN. I presume if I was a member of the Committee on Ways and Means of this House I could find means enough to pay $3,000,000. In the name of my country, the richest country on the face of God's earth—a country that during our late war raised daily for months in succession $4,000,000 from its own resources—I trust I never shall be required to find out where $3,000,000 can be raised when we have two years to raise it in.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I raise the point of order that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GUNCKEL] should address the Chair—not turn from the Chair to address the House.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Well, that is a little unkind in my good friend, who is an old member and who makes a point upon a new member which he has never made upon an old one, although he knows I am simply following the example of my seniors.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I made the point because I knew it was good, and I wanted to break the gentleman at the start.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I fear he will have a hard time to break me into speaking to the Chairman and not to the whole committee, when it is the committee and not the Chairman that I seek to convince.

Mr. DAWES. Why did not the gentleman from Tennessee correct an old member, who turned around and addressed the House for an hour?

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I was waiting for you, as you are always correcting everybody.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman would learn from me, he would learn a little manners.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. You never had any yourself.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order, and the gentleman from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. GUNCKEL. My good friend from Tennessee does me honor overmuch in wanting me to speak so I shall not be heard by the House, for it is an admission by a friend of this bill that I am stating facts that damage his cause. But I have a duty to perform, and so I cannot accommodate him.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. My good friend misunderstood me. I wanted to hear him.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Well, if my anxious friend will come here I shall be glad to have him hear me. It may do him good.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. If you address the Chair, I can hear you from my own seat.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Now, sir, the only answer that can be made to the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] is that we shall borrow the money or raise it by increased taxation. But do we want to do either? A great deal has been said about the good faith and honor of this nation. My distinguished friend from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] in the discussion on the currency question a few weeks ago, had a great deal to say upon that subject, and especially in connection with the platforms of the republican and democratic parties. I beg right here to call his attention to one plank of the republican platform:

7. The annual revenue, after paying current expenditures, pensions, and the interest on the public debt, should furnish a moderate balance—

For what? For the centennial exhibition? For any show? For any celebration? No. But—for the reduction of the public debt.

The democratic platform was substantially the same. Here, then, both parties pledged themselves that, after paying the necessary expenses of the Government—pensions, interest on the public debt, &c., being what we owe and need to carry on the Government—every cent of the revenues of the country should be applied to the reduction of the public debt. And yet these gentlemen who talk so eloquently of the honor and good faith of the nation would persuade us to violate these party pledges, and disregard the principles of honesty and honor thus sanctioned by the whole people of the country.

The eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] claims that honor and good faith require us to make this appropriation. With all deference to the learned gentleman, I cannot see it. I find nothing of that kind in the laws of Congress, nothing in the acts of the President, nothing in the whole history of the centennial. On the contrary, there was a distinct avowal upon this floor and in the Senate, by such distinguished gentlemen as the Senators from Pennsylvania, (and even the worthy Senator from my own State, Mr. SHERMAN,) that all that was asked was that the Government should give character to the exposition and give the people of Philadelphia the privilege of having the show (I use their own word) at their own expense. Both acts of Congress (and as they have been read I will not detain the House by reading them again) contain distinct limitations and conditions that the United States shall not be liable for any of the debts of the corporation or be called upon to pay one cent of the expenses of the exhibition.

Right here I ask to have read at the Clerk's desk an extract from a speech of Charles Sumner, delivered in the Senate a few weeks ago upon this very subject. As it is one of the last public utterances of that great and good man, it comes to us with peculiar force and solemnity.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senators speak of pledges, of conditions. Sir, there is but one real pledge in this bill; there is but one real condition. That pledge is, that the United States shall not be called to pay a dollar; the condition is that our Government is relieved of all responsibility on account of this undertaking; and that is the ruling condition, to which all else is subordinate. Let me read it:

"That no compensation for services shall be paid to the commissioners, or other officers provided by this act, from the Treasury of the United States; and the United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition, or by reason of the same."

Now, Mr. President, could language be plainer, more explicit? The United States is never to pay a dollar. And now, sir, the vista opens; we are to begin with $3,000,000 down, and nobody knows how many millions afterward; and yet the fundamental condition was: "The United States shall not be liable for any expenses attending such exhibition, or by reason of the same." How, in the face of that condition, can Senators rise in this Chamber and speak of public faith as pledged to this measure? Sir, the public faith is the other way. You and I and all of us are bound to the people of the United States by that condition embodied in the bill, that not a dollar shall be paid. That condition commended the bill originally to the people, because they saw that under it a generous corporation would undertake a service for which the country would be grateful; and the people saw that their taxes would not be increased, that their pockets would not be entered. But now the proposition is to increase the taxes and to enter the pockets to carry out this bill.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Mr. Sumner seemed to think the good faith and honor of the United States did not require a single cent of expenditure from the General Government; that the obligation of honor and good faith was all on the other side; that the managers of this enterprise were bound in honor and good faith not to ask one cent from Congress; that the members of Congress were bound in honor and good faith to the people of the country that their money should not be taken for this purpose, and that it should in no case cause them to suffer increased taxation and increased burdens; and was he not right, exactly right?

I am reminded, in this connection, that there was made here yesterday a remarkable statement by the honorable gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PACKARD,] which I desire to have read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows from CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 6:

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine desires to know when this Congress became bound to assist this exhibition. It was bound the very day it passed the first enactment providing for an international exposition. I will say for myself that from the very day when the measure became a law I felt that Congress would be bound in a certain sense to carry out this work, and I said to some of my friends that Congress would have to pay a portion of the expenses, and that when the time came I should be willing for one to come forward and assist, so far as lay in my power, in providing for those expenses.

Mr. GUNCKEL. So it appears that away back in 1871 they knew very well that they would come and ask Congress to make this appropriation of money. The proposition then was very innocent in its form; they only wanted an incorporation so as to give the enterprise "character;" they wanted no money, and would pay all the expenses themselves. Then, after a while they wanted simply to have the financial managers incorporated, and a provision by which the Government should print their bonds so that they should not be counterfeited; and still no Government money asked, no Government liability proposed. So matters went along until the beginning of this session, when they were a little fearful that the invitation was not quite explicit enough. They simply wanted us to make the invitation a little more cordial and emphatic; that was all. So we have been carried along step by step, until now it appears by the frank declaration of my honest friend from Indiana that they knew all the time, even away back in 1871, that Congress was to be committed to the appropriation, and that, notwithstanding the statements made in Congress and the conditions of the several acts to the contrary, they would in their own good time come here and claim these millions of dollars, and insist that the honor and good faith of the nation was pledged thereto.

Mr. PACKARD. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish to say right here that what I have said in reference to that applied to myself only. I expressly stated I spoke for myself alone. I had no word with any gentleman who was one of the original promoters of this enterprise. I said that, in my own conviction in reference to what I expected in regard to this matter, I felt it would be my duty to vote for congressional aid, and I did not doubt the time would come when Congress would be called upon for such aid. I told the same thing to a few of my friends, not any gentleman from Pennsylvania being included. I mentioned the matter outside of Congress entirely, but not to any gentleman connected with this House. I felt then and believed fully they would have to come to Congress for aid to carry on this celebration, as they have come to Congress now. It is only what I felt myself would occur; and I resolved then, if it did occur, I would give it my sanction, my support, and my vote.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I honor the candor and frankness of my friend from Indiana. He is a western man, and like western men frank and honest in his avowals. He admits that it was known and understood at the time that they could not raise the money themselves, and would have to come to Congress and ask for what they distinctly avowed they would not want and would not ask. And yet these gentlemen talk of "honor" and "good faith."

My friend comes from Indiana. I believe he is in favor of an inflation of the currency. I believe he is one of the gentlemen who told us during the discussion on the currency question that there was a general prostration of business in Indiana, the factories were stopped, the operatives thrown out of employment, and men, women, and children starving. Was this merely an inflation argument; or was it really true? I notice there was a meeting held at Indianapolis the other day, when fifteen hundred laboring men marched through the streets carrying banners, and upon them were such inscriptions as "Corruption among the upper ten—starvation among the millions;" "God help the poor—the Government protects the rich." If there was reason for such a demonstration and for such inscriptions; if there be really so many men out of employment and so many women and children starving in the wheat and corn-growing districts of Indiana, is this the way to relieve them? Will it help them to give three million dollars for the purpose of a grand international centennial exhibition, and thereby force the Committee on Ways and Means and Congress to put the tax back upon tea and coffee? When they ask for bread, you give them a stone; adding insult to injury.

But, Mr. Chairman, you will remember that in the beginning the friends of this enterprise assured us that all they wanted was an opportunity to go to the people of the country; that the people were patriotic, liberal, and unanimously in favor of a grand Fouth of July celebration; that there would be a million of people who would be glad to subscribe ten dollars each, and so they would have $10,000,000—all the money they wanted. Well, how have these predictions been verified? They have had a year or two in which to get these subscriptions. They admit in their official report to Congress that they have used all sorts of means, by circulars, through newspapers, through the various national banks, by different agencies—and we know pretty well how efficient they are in this business, as we have been ourselves receiving a good deal of matter of that sort for two weeks past—I say after all these efforts, after all their appeals for over a year, what have they done? The gentleman in eloquent words told us how enthusiastic the people of Maine, including the poor fishermen, were for this exposition and how willing to have a liberal appropriation therefor. Now, what, sir, has the good State of Maine, when it had an opportunity to show its faith by its works, done? What have the patriotic, liberal people, the warm-blooded, great-hearted people, of Maine given?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] gave us a list of the subscriptions in each State, and the number of subscribers and the amount of money they were willing to give the centennial exhibition. I have carefully examined the list from the top to the bottom, but cannot even find the State of Maine in the list, and so am reluctantly forced to the conclusion that there was not even one man in the whole State who was willing to subscribe ten dollars to the centennial exhibition. The State of Indiana, which the gentleman [Mr. PACKARD] told us yesterday was one of the richest in the country, one of the richest in proportion to size and population in the world, subscribed thirty-two shares, at ten dollars each, making a grand total of $320. And the State of Connecticut, honored as it is with having the president of this centennial commission—its people thoroughly informed through that gentleman's newspaper of the purposes and objects of the exposition, and blessed with general prosperity, plenty of banks, and plenty of money—what has she done for this great, this patriotic purpose? I find the State of Connecticut subscribed six shares, at ten dollars each, making the magnificent sum of sixty dollars, toward this grand centennial celebration, which we have been been repeatedly told comes only once in a hundred years. And, as further evidence of the great popular impulse, I beg to put on record that there was taken in the State of Iowa one share, in Kansas one share, in Tennessee one share—thirty dollars in three States; while I am pained to say that the great, rich States of Vermont and New Hampshire did not contribute one single penny.

Now, Mr. Chairman—for I must address myself to the Chair occasionally or my friend from Tennessee will again call me to order—they went also to the Legislatures of the different States. They asked them for appropriations, and they were refused. They went to the people, and the people refused them. I have heard of a good many appeals from Congress to the people, but this is the first time I ever heard of an appeal from the people to Congress.

They come to us, and ask us to do what the Legislatures have refused to do. They come to us, and ask us to do for the people what the people have refused to do for themselves. My friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] does not care for the people. He is bound to be right. Well, now, I have heard a good deal of that sort of congressional talk. I have heard expressed a great disregard of the press and of the clamor of the people. It seems to me that we occasionally forget why we are here and what we are.

Mr. MONROE. And who made us.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Yes; and who made us. We forget that we are here simply because the people cannot come themselves. They have become so numerous that they cannot assemble en masse and make their own laws, as did the people of the simple democracies of olden times. They are compelled of necessity to select representatives, who are simply their servants to do their will. I think that in the case of my good friend from Maine, if he can conscientiously carry out what his constituents want, he is in duty bound so to do; but if not, it is his duty to resign, go home, and make way for somebody who will represent the will of the people.

Surely, sir, there can be no question as to what the will of the people is on this question. Suppose they could by any possibility be all gathered together in these hard times, with money scarce, with men out of employment and women and children starving, how many millions would they be willing to be taxed to give to this Philadelphia show? Would it be one million? Would it be one dollar?

But the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] says that all they ask is the pitiful sum of $3,000,000. Well, it may be a pitiful sum, but it would feed and clothe not only all the sufferers by the Mississippi inundation, but all the suffering in the whole country. It may be a pitiful sum, but it would be enough to finish the Washington monument and cheapen transportation by clearing out some of our western rivers. It may be a pitiful sum, but it would go far toward paying the debts still due the soldiers, to whom we owe the life of the nation, and answering their appeals for the increase of their pensions and the equalization of their bounties. Well, if pitiful in amount now it will not long remain so; the $3,000,000 will soon grow to $6,000,000, and that to $10,000,000. Upon this point I beg to quote again from Charles Sumner. In his speech you will find that he had made a careful calculation in regard to the whole matter. He found that the Vienna exposition cost from twelve to seventeen million dollars; and if you will examine the centennial report you will find these gentlemen are careful to say that labor is a great deal higher here, that material is higher, and that it will cost a great deal more here than in Austria, and the United States therefore ought to be much more liberal than they were across the ocean.

But to the quotation; and I beg you to remember they are among the last words of Charles Sumner:

> Sir, I content myself now with the language of Washington, when I say that the $3,000,000 will be but a "flea-bite" compared to what will be required if this swelling scheme is carried forward in the form announced, and in the propositions already presented to the Senate.
> Sir, I cannot err; there can be no mistake about that. We have before us the experience of the Old World in the exhibitions already held. We know the large expenditures. We have the recent experience of Austria; and although there is a discrepancy in the testimony with regard to the cost or the sum total of cost on that occasion, yet what we do know, even the statement made to-day by my friend the Senator from California, founded on a diplomatic dispatch from our minister at Vienna, is sufficient to warn us now. Why, sir, according to that dispatch the cost was 20,000,000 florins, gold, equal to $12,000,000 of our money. Now, does any one suppose that a structure equivalent in architectural character and in its equipment to that which recently excited the admiration of the visitor at Vienna can be reproduced in our country for the same sum it cost them at Vienna? Does any one suppose it can be done? Senators, look at it carefully and frankly. Will it not cost much more? Is there not a difference in labor between Philadelphia and Vienna which introduces at once an enormous discrepancy? If the exhibition at Vienna cost $12,000,000, will not the exhibition at Philadelphia, if organized on the same scale, cost $24,000,000? Will it cost a dollar less? Will the people of the United States, if once engaged in this considerable work, be content with an exhibition that shall fall short of that of Vienna? Will they not require that the art treasures assembled here shall find a temporary home in a palace that shall rival anything in Vienna? Will they be content with anything less? Should they be content with anything less? * * * Where, then, does that lead us in cost? Far, very far, beyond $3,000,000; far, very far, beyond $10,000,000; far beyond $15,000,000; I fear far beyond $20,000,000.

That, I verily believe, is the expenditure which may be anticipated. Why, then, do these gentlemen not come in a straightforward way and tell us what they want? In the light of what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PACKARD] told us, why did not they tell these things in 1871 or 1872, and so permit Congress to act knowingly and advisedly in the premises? Why did they not say in plain English that it was not incorporation, not character, not an act to prevent counterfeiting their bonds, that they wanted, but money, and that the money they wanted was ten or fifteen million dollars? Would not such an open, manly course have been more becoming in those who talk so eloquently of good faith and honor?

Mr. MCCORMICK. Will the gentleman allow me just at this time to hand him a letter that may give him some light on this subject—a letter from the centennial board of finance?

Mr. GUNCKEL. I do not want any documents from the gentleman just now. If he has any question to ask I will endeavor to answer it. I believe the gentleman has the floor after me, and I do not care that he shall inject his speech into mine.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I do not want to make a speech. But I hold in my hand a letter from the chairman of the centennial board of finance, assuring Congress that $3,000,000 is the total sum that will be asked at any time.

Mr. GUNCKEL. And the same gentlemen told us three years ago that they did not want anything, and they repeated that statement one year afterward. How then can we accept as very credible what they say now, that they only want three millions? They say if Congress will give them three millions, they can then go back to the people and get the rest from the people. Do you suppose that when they have once commenced getting money from Congress that they will ever go back to the people for the balance they want? They have not succeeded very well so far in their appeals to the people. They will hardly think of going to Maine again. They will not even be tempted to go to Connecticut. What will they do? Like all people in a similar position, they will come back to Congress, because they well know that is the easiest mode of getting money ever yet invented in our Yankee nation.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. GUNCKEL. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMICK. Has any member of the centennial commission or of the board of finance ever asked Congress for a dollar before?

Mr. GUNCKEL. That is what I complain of, that they did not say in the beginning that they would want this money.

Mr. McCORMICK. Or that they pledged themselves that they would not come here for money?

Mr. GUNCKEL. Yes; they distinctly pledged themselves in 1870, in 1871, and 1872, as the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] showed by the copious extracts which he submitted to the committee yesterday.

Mr. McCORMICK. The gentleman reads the law differently from what I do.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. They asked for four or five million dollars a few months ago.

Mr. GUNCKEL. My colleague, [Mr. SMITH,] who is a member of the committee, says that they asked for four or five millions a few months ago. I do not know why they should make the estimate any less now.

Mr. McCORMICK. I wish to ask the gentleman another question. I have been a member of the centennial commission from the beginning of its organization, and I never heard of its approaching Congress for money before. Nor have I ever heard any member of the commission express his feelings that Congress should not at some time be asked for assistance. Those promises were made by citizens of Pennsylvania, not by members of the commission. The commission was not organized at that time. The gentlemen who come to you now have never been before you in any capacity whatever to ask money.

Mr. GUNCKEL. If the gentleman will look at the law he will see that it contained an express prohibition; as Mr. Sumner said, it provided that they should never come to Congress for a cent. And the gentlemen who represented them on this floor and in the Senate declared that they never would. My complaint, which my friend does not seem to understand, is that in the beginning they did not claim what they are claiming now; that they did not honestly and frankly, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PACKARD] did yesterday, say three years ago that they meant to ask Congress for pecuniary aid. We should then have had something to say as to organizing this exhibition. We should probably have wanted to organize it in a particular way; and the West, the great West, would have had something to say about the location of the exposition, and would perhaps have wanted it a little nearer to the center of population in this country. But they drew us on, step by step, till now they have got the machinery as they wanted it, and the location where they pleased. And now they will come here from year to year and ask more and more money from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. McCORMICK. I hope the gentleman will admit that I come from far enough west.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Yes; my friend comes from Arizona, and Arizona is a Territory that does not pay much of the taxes of the country.

Mr. McCORMICK. We have taken our share of the centennial stock.

Mr. GUNCKEL. If I represented a people of that sort, may be I would be upon the same side; but I happen to represent a people who pay a large part of the taxes, and therefore I vote as I know they would have me vote, in opposition to this measure.

Mr. McCORMICK. I call the gentleman's attention to the number of shares of centennial stock taken by Arizona.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Very well, I will look on this list and see what Arizona has done.

Mr. McCORMICK. She has done her proportion.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I shall be sorry if she beats Connecticut and Maine, where the people are prosperous and have a superabundance of banks and money. Arizona has subscribed for one hundred and two shares. Well done for Arizona! That is just one hundred and two more than Maine, Vermont, and New Hampshire together, and about one hundred more than Connecticut and three or four times as much as the whole of New England.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] said yesterday that we were committed to this, and my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has been very eloquent about that matter. I certainly give him credit for a speech of great ability and eloquence. These gentleman say that we are committed, that the President's proclamation and the letter of the Secretary of State bind us, in honor, to this international exhibition. How came the President to issue his proclamation? There was an express provision in the original act that the President should do nothing and the Secretary of State should do nothing until provision had been made for the erection of all these buildings; that is, until money was obtained with which to erect them. How, then, came the President to make this proclamation? Why, let us see. Let us take the language of the President himself, in his proclamation of July, 1873. Here it is: "And whereas his excellency the governor of the State of Pennsylvania did, on the 24th day of June, 1873, inform him that provision had been made for the erection of the buildings," &c. The governor of Pennsylvania assured the President that provision had been made. Now, when you talk about provision for the Army, or provision for the poor, or provision for the construction of buildings, you mean the money by which it may be done. The President was therefore officially informed by the governor of Pennsylvania that the money had been obtained for the erection of all these buildings. How did they get it? Why, there has been an appropriation of $500,000 by the city of Philadelphia and $1,000,000 by the State of Pennsylvania, and for these I will gladly give them full credit and high praise. But for what were these $1,500,000 appropriated? For the general purposes of this centennial association; to go into this same fund into which they want the money of the United States to go? O, no; it is a special fund, for a special purpose. What is that purpose? Why, to erect an art building, one building and one only, and that building not to be the property of the centennial commission, not to come into the common fund. O, no; but their million and a half is to be a preferred claim, secured by a first mortgage. If money is to be lost our money shall be lost, not theirs. Come success or come failure, their money is safe. That is the way in which we are committed; and it was upon that statement of the governor of Pennsylvania that this letter of the Secretary of State was sent to the different powers of Europe.

But my friend from Maine says we have given such an invitation that we cannot without a breach of etiquette take it back, and he grew very humorous in inditing a letter of withdrawal addressed to Bismarck. Well, sir, the accomplished gentleman undertook a work of supererogation. The Secretary of State, Mr. Fish, had anticipated him. It seems he was quite equal to the emergency. What gentlemen call his letter of invitation was in fact anything but an invitation. He did not invite foreign nations on the part of the United States; he simply commended to their favorable notice this Philadelphia exhibition. But, finding that his first letter had been misunderstood, finding that Bismarck had misunderstood him, he sent a second letter, which I have here, and which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

It will be observed that the President in his proclamation has extended no "invitation" to foreign powers to participate in the exhibition. He was not authorized so to do, and while he desires to attract as much attention and interest as possible thereto, he carefully confines himself to "commending" the celebration of the centennial anniversary of American independence, and the exhibition which is to be held in connection therewith, to all nations who may be pleased to take part therein. It is presumed that you will not have failed to observe the guarded language of the President's proclamation, and the difference between it and that which would be used in extending an invitation to other powers.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Very well and very gracefully done; it puts us right with our own people, and puts us right with the people of the world.

But I have already taken up much more time than I intended. I will close simply by reference to what I conceive to be the will of the people. How many petitions have come in here from the people asking that this appropriation shall be made? Not a single petition, not a single memorial. In my own State, the State of Ohio—and I have taken some pains to ascertain the fact—not one single newspaper, city or country, daily or weekly, has, so far as I have ascertained, favored this appropriation. In so far as I have been able to consult my own constituents and the people of the State of Ohio, I have yet to find a single person that favored this appropriation. Speaking of the newspapers, perhaps I should make one single exception. I hold in my hand a newspaper of very great circulation, independent in politics. In its issue of Monday last there is a leading editorial that seems to be in favor of this centennial exhibition. Without pretending to adopt it, or sanction either its language or its statements, I will send it to the Clerk's desk to be read. If it seems to reflect upon the very honorable gentlemen connected with this exhibition, I disavow any such purpose. I have the highest respect for the distinguished gentleman who is at the head of this centennial commission, and each and every one of his associates.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Then I beg the gentleman to allow me to say a word.

Mr. GUNCKEL. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I am not so thankful for the respect which the gentleman says he entertains for me if he is going to ask an outsider to read that which he would not say himself. If there be anything which is of an insulting nature or reflecting upon the motives and conduct of those associated with me, I beg the gentleman not to have it read here; if he will assume it himself I will not object.

Mr. GUNCKEL. The editor of the paper is, I believe, the intimate personal and political friend of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY of Connecticut. I am on intimate terms with many editors.

Mr. GUNCKEL. The newspaper is the Cincinnati Commercial. Its editor and the gentleman from Connecticut are members, I hear, of the great newspaper syndicate that is going to control public opinion in this country, and organize a new hard-money party. I presume the gentleman read the article on yesterday.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I am not in the habit of looking to the Cincinnati Commercial so much as many Ohio men are.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I do not see why the honorable gentleman need be so sensitive. The editor is his friend, and the newspaper in favor of a centennial exhibition; so I do not and will not indorse it. I do not think I need to adopt everything which I have read in argument. I may have an authority read; in so far as it may suit my purpose I may adopt it. So I do with this newspaper article. I send it up to be read for what it may be worth, and the gentleman may say what he likes in reply. With that I close my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

We beg leave to say that we are friendly to the idea of a great centennial celebration in Philadelphia, and that we hope some such idea will be practically carried out. We oppose the schemes of the men who are managing the project now before Congress. They should not ask money from our cash-box after certifying that they would not ask it. They should not take three millions out of an empty Treasury, to be screwed from people who cannot stand any more taxes. They should not pretend that this sum will be the full extent of their demand, or the half of it, or the quarter of it. They should not keep a gang of lobbyists at Washington, engineering in ways which are anything but virtuous, high-toned, or patriotic. * * * They should not resort to all sorts or any sorts of trickery to boost up a scheme which had its birth under suspicious circumstances, and which looks as though it would come to its death through the leprosy that has been transfused into its blood. We have spoken freely about these things. We have done so in the name of decency and in behalf of our national reputation, which must not be allowed to become the laughing-stock of the world. In doing so, we have not wronged Philadelphia, and have not—never for a moment—cried down the idea of a centennial celebration there. On the contrary, we hope to see a great and successful celebration there two years hence, though it is absurd to suppose that the national centennial will not be celebrated anywhere else than in Philadelphia. We trust, however, that it may be the proper kind of thing. It should be an American affair, and not an international one. The scheme of it should be practicable, and not fantastical. It should not be a thing which will cost ten, fifteen, or twenty million dollars. It should be sustained by the city in which it is to be held, and by stock subscriptions obtained from the American people, and not be a beggar at the Federal Treasury. It should not be run by jobbers, and should not keep a lobby. Its foundations should be laid in truth; its structure raised in wisdom, and it should be crowned with patriotism. It ought to be a work of beauty and utility, of honor and intelligence, and it ought to be something of which the people will be proud while it is in progress, and of which the country will not be ashamed after it is consummated. Let the Philadelphians throw over the foolish scheme which has been forced upon them, adopt a reasonable, sensible, and honest one, and they are sure to find that the whole country will give it enthusiastic support.

Mr. SHANKS. I want to speak of that myself. I do not know what paper that article is published in.

Mr. GUNCKEL. The Cincinnati Commercial.

Mr. SHANKS. Very well. The paper proposes that this exposition shall be a work of patriotism, and yet it goes on to say that the work ought to be done by the city of Philadelphia. Can you call that a work of patriotism, when you attempt to organize a national enterprise and charge the carrying it out upon a single city in the country? If you call that patriotism, I confess I do not understand the term.

I think this ought to be a work of patriotism, and for that reason I think it ought to be a national work. Nothing less than a national work will be a work of patriotism in connection with the celebration of the nation's birth. What I objected to in this whole proceeding was that it was not in the first place organized as a national matter outright. I was not satisfied that it should be proposed to raise by stock subscriptions money for the purpose of celebrating the birth of this great Republic; after we had been in existence one hundred years, to propose that the children of our illustrious sires should go about raising subscriptions from sewing women and laboring men for the purpose of carrying on a national celebration.

Why, sir, the men whom the people sent here to speak for the nation and the nation's honor now turn upon you and say that they are afraid to vote this and that because of the public sentiment created by papers that do not speak in the interest of the people in this matter, but speak only for the purpose of creating a prejudice which may enable them to sell their papers whenever and wherever they may find purchasers who desire to read the last exciting notices and the last wonderful accounts.

Sir, you cannot make this a national matter by going out among the people and gathering subscriptions. That is not the way to make this enterprise national; and short of nationality it is not worth a farthing. I hope that it may be blotted from the memory of man, unless it becomes national in its character—unless the nation takes hold of it and executes it as becomes forty millions of free people.

Why, sir, the proposition that Philadelphia shall carry out a national enterprise like this would, if consummated, forbid every man of soul and spirit from going to Philadelphia during the summer of 1876; for who would feel willing to go there and foist himself upon a private enterprise of the people of Philadelphia?

It is unworthy of the Congress of the nation to plead upon this floor conditions that were forced upon the people when they inaugurated this enterprise—to plead that it was promised the people of Pennsylvania would bear all the expense themselves. Why, sir, the little State of New Jersey—I speak of it only geographically when I say it is small—in view of the fact that the nation has forgotten to take hold of this matter in time, that State, out of its own means, has given $100,000 for this work. And I suppose there are gentlemen ready to go to Philadelphia and celebrate a national event upon money paid by the people of New Jersey. The State of Pennsylvania has furnished more than $3,000,000; and I suppose gentlemen here who have been struck with this economical fit will be very happy to go to Philadelphia and there celebrate a national birthday, and charge the account to the State of Pennsylvania, because the hall in which the Declaration of Independence was made happens to be in the State of Pennsylvania. Why, sir, there is another hall as famous as that; it happens to be in Massachusetts. We cannot hold two national celebrations on the one hundredth anniversary of our independence; consequently we must wait another hundred years before we can have a celebration in Faneuil Hall; and I promise, sir, that then I will not ask $3,000,000 from the national Treasury to pay the expense of the celebration. Other men, however, may do so; and I trust in God that if when that time comes this nation shall still be prospering, the people there will not forget themselves and the country so far as to ask a few of their neighbors to celebrate the anniversary of the nation at their own expense.

Sir, I hope this enterprise will fail, I pray to Heaven it may fail, if the nation is too small to speak out in behalf of its own nationality. As a celebration of Philadelphia, or Pennsylvania, or New Jersey, it ought not to prosper. I want it to die in its birth rather than that it shall be less than a national work. The statement that Indiana has subscribed only a few shares of stock is correct; I hope she will subscribe no more. The statement that other States and Territories have done little or nothing is correct; I hope they will do no more. The funds for this celebration ought to come out of the public Treasury. What would you think of inviting foreign nations to come here to celebrate our national birthday at the expense of Philadelphia? I have no desire to witness such a thing. I hope this Congress will either forbid once and for all that the Executive of the nation shall make any invitation, or hold any communication with foreign powers at all upon this question, and direct him to recall what he has done, or else will vote manfully and patriotically the money necessary to carry out this enterprise. I have said all I wish to say. I think this is a national work; I am not willing to make it less, if we are to have anything to do with it as a nation.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, unfortunately this bill calls upon us to shed, not tears, but money—not money which we can take from the surplus of an overflowing treasury: not money which we can gather with easy hand by a loan which our children must pay, but money which we must tax upon the business and upon the property of a people who are no longer rich or prosperous. And for what? Not to feed our poor, of whom we have many; not to strengthen our defenses; not to unlock our harbors; not to straighten our watercourses, but to imitate here on the soil of the New World a fashionable, gaudy, Old World pageant like those into which, under the name of exposition or fair all the principal sovereignties of Europe one after another have poured their full coffers and out of which they have taken nothing but disappointment and loss.

The people whom I represent bear burdens enough, and I am not the man to add this one to them. Yet I admit with my friend from Kansas [Mr. COBB] that it is not a pleasant task to oppose any scheme which is urged on the plea of patriotism. If there is any feeling of the American heart which can always be touched to the finest issue it is patriotism; and next to this is that love of eloquence which makes each one of us almost a Cicero. And yet here comes this centennial, which in surpassing richness offers a field both for patriotism and for eloquence. Sir, it is not simply unpleasant to oppose it; it is dangerous; for the member who stands up here and speaks against this centennial will be accused of a lack of patriotism and of a lack of eloquence; and who of us likes to be represented to his constituency as being neither patriotic nor eloquent, or, to use the words that I heard here the other day, of being "neither smart nor good?" Why, Mr. Chairman, what our constituencies want is a man who can shed tears on every proper occasion; a man who dare at any place give a piece of his mind to the "effete monarchies of the Old World." Shall we have a member who can not speak of Saratoga and Yorktown, New Orleans and Chippewa, Chapultepec and Mexico, Donelson and Vicksburgh; a man who cannot bound this land of freedom which is "laved by two oceans and a gulf;" a man who cannot rustle these battle-born and blood-stained greenbacks and boast they are the best currency at 10 per cent. discount which the world has ever seen; a dumb dog who dare not in the face of this House and the presence of his constituency, in Maine or elsewhere, take that flag which is over your head and carry it down the centuries with the same courage and at the same risk as Sergeant Bates? Such a man, with soul so dead and tongue so dumb, who cares not for the centennial, shall surely have the pleasure of reading the proceedings of the Forty-fourth Congress in the quiet of his own home. Yet it is only to vote $3,000,000—only "a paltry three millions!" Why, my friend [Mr. FRYE] says those fishermen on the coast of Maine are asking to give it. Why don't they? What are three millions? This is a great nation and owes two thousand millions! Borrow three more, and let us celebrate its birthday. That is the paltry sum we have just saved on our late appropriation bill. It took us but a month to do it, day sessions, night sessions, long speeches, short speeches; but we saved it, and out of the girls of the Treasury, out of the clerks of the Departments, out of the laborers of the Capitol! To save it we have sent want or a pinching economy into a thousand homes. Let us now, at a stroke, give it to a world's fair, and pity those who are so unpatriotic as to vote against it.

I oppose this bill in the interest of my constituency, but in the face of my Legislature. The Legislature of New Jersey requested me to vote for this bill. Ah, Mr. Chairman, that Legislature made a terrible mistake! Had they had the good fortune to send me to the Senate, they would have made me their representative and I would have obeyed their request; but now I stand here on the floor of this House as the Representative of the people; as such I accept with all respect the request of the Legislature, but I accept it only as an argument and not as a conclusion. I accept their requests as arguments of the highest authority, but I obey them only when they indicate and represent the will of the people to whom I am responsible.

In this case the request of the New Jersey Legislature does not represent the will of my people. Why, Mr. Chairman, for me to vote to give $3,000,000 to this great festival (call it the world's fair, an international exhibition, or what you will) would be to taunt the unemployed of Paterson; nor should I dare to walk again their streets.

While I am speaking of Legislatures I want to know, and I ask, what Maine has done? She is willing to shed her tears; has she also shed her money? Let Maine stand aside. What State has done more than to utter those fine words which butter no parsnips? There are gentlemen here from Tennessee, there are gentlemen here from Virginia, and they will read to you, if they have not read before, the wonderful resolutions which their Legislatures have passed. But if New Jersey made a mistake, if she passed resolutions, too, she followed them up consistently with acts—with a money appropriation. What did Tennessee, what did Virginia do? They shed their beautiful words, like the rain of heaven or the tears of Maine, but they shed no money. With an eloquence which was unsurpassed except by that of my friend from Pennsylvania at the opening of this debate, they refused to vote their own money but urged their Representatives upon this floor to vote the money of the nation.

When I heard all these fine words and when I saw their impotent conclusion, there flashed upon me a kaleidoscope of views: the first gathering of the Pickwick club when it was unanimously voted that every member should have a spree whenever he wished, provided he paid his own bill; the smiling face of Mr. Skimpole, whose rhetoric was beautiful but the color of whose money was never seen; and the misfortunes of the eloquent but insolent philosopher who dived into the unfathomable and soared into the infinite, but who never paid cash.

I wish it to be remembered that while I am so unsentimental, so lacking in the elements of public virtue as to refuse to participate in this occasion, there is not a man, unless he comes from my own State, who can cast at me a stone. The State of New Jersey gave something besides words. She gave $100,000. The other States have either withheld their money and their words, or have given words and refused their money. Mr. Chairman, I think it is much better either to say nothing, or to do something.

I refuse to vote for the $3,000,000, first, because this Government in its present condition cannot give $3,000,000 to anything. If I thought this was a proper occasion, and the United States had $3,000,000 to give away, I would not give it. Why? Because $3,000,000 will not be sufficient. They will want ten millions. And again, I would not vote the appropriation of these $3,000,000, even if it were an appropriate object, and even if we had the three millions or ten millions to give, for this reason: I think my friend from Maine, [Mr. HALE]—he of the arguments and not he of the tears—convinced me yesterday that we of this House were entrapped—I say it candidly, for I listened to his argument—we were entrapped, I do not know whether intentionally or unintentionally, and it is not my business to look into the motives of any one—but we were entrapped into giving a quasi support to this exposition. And I am not the man to support any man or any association that endeavors to obtain a result by indirection. Let them come out boldly and ask what they want, tell us the truth, and sink or swim upon that issue. Nor shall I yield to the arguments of those who say "grant it; but because you have been deceived into going one mile, go twain." I think it is better morality and it is better policy if any of us find ourselves in the wrong path, whether we got there by mistake or otherwise, when we have made the discovery to resolutely pause and turn.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I would like the gentleman, while he is on that one point, after his deliberate repetition of the expression "entrapped"—I would like him to be so candid as to name the members of the United States centennial commission, of whom there are ninety-four, with the commission of U. S. Grant in their pockets, who had anything to do with laying the trap he has so courteously intimated has been laid.

Mr. PHELPS. I name no man.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. You cannot do it.

Mr. PHELPS. I name no man in that association. I recognize only the acts of the association, of the corporation itself.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. That is exactly what I demand the gentleman shall do.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from Connecticut, who is a good lawyer, knows well enough that when we are dealing with a corporation or an association we do not meddle with the individual, but we take the act of the association, or the act of the corporation, as a corporate and associate act, and release the individual.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. There is a sort of fairness about that. But let me ask the gentleman one question. As to this entrapping that he speaks of, these declarations or promises or opinions were all expressed long before any member of this commission held a commission, or before the corporation was organized. Now, how can he charge that upon the commission?

Mr. PHELPS. I will give a full absolution. I will acquit the eloquent chairman of the commission, and all his associates, from any guile in thought, in word, or in deed. But here is a dilemma. If not guileful they were very careless, or they were very ignorant men to assume a responsibility and enter an association without examining the acts which define its power, or tracing the history of the measure which they undertook to father. Now we find them representing the measure, and we are forced to hold them responsible for its past.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Then, Mr. Chairman, it was we of the commission who were entrapped.

Mr. PHELPS. That is my opinion. But I must decline to yield further, because my time is passing away. I stated, Mr. Chairman, that when we got into a wrong path, as I think we have now, it was better to resolutely turn than to go farther. I think this is a wrong path. And now for the merits of the question: I drop all questions of the pecuniary ability or of the pecuniary duty of the Government in this regard, and come to the consideration of these.

I say to my friend from Connecticut he is in a bad position and we are in a bad path, because this celebration should not be international. We ask the governments of the Old World to come here and join in our celebration of American independence—to celebrate what? Our glory and their humiliation; the triumph of the institutions of government which we cherish, the fall of the institutions which they uphold.

Can we expect that England will take a zealous interest in an anniversary which celebrates the loss of the brightest jewel that was in her crown? Can we expect that the Emperor William, already struggling with the independence of his own Parliament, will want to call the attention of his German Hampdens to this most conspicuous exposition of representative government? Can we expect McMahon, who, in the name of Brutus, is wielding the scepter of the Cæsars—can we expect him to call the attention of the French to the success of a government which is of the people, by the people, and for the people? It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that to make of this an international exhibition, and to invite men who belong to European governments to come here and rejoice with us in this celebration, is absurd. It is to me the same as if a man urging his unwilling bachelor friend to marry should tell him if he only would, he would get a mother-in-law.

Mr. MELLISH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PHELPS. If it is pertinent to this point.

Mr. MELLISH. It is pertinent to this point.

Mr. PHELPS. Then go ahead.

Mr. MELLISH. I only want one minute. Will it not be a funny spectacle——

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman has it written, and he can get leave to have it printed without taking my time, which is limited.

Mr. MELLISH. It will not take a minute; and I do not see any opportunity of getting the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. I have promised to conclude at twenty minutes before five o'clock, and I really cannot yield.

Mr. MELLISH. It is not against your argument. The gentleman is mistaken if he imagines that I am in favor of the appropriation. You said I might ask the question if it was on the point. It is directly to the point.

Mr. PHELPS. O! I did not know that the gentleman from New York was an ally. I cheerfully yield, and recognize the propriety of his interruption.

Mr. MELLISH. Will it not be a funny spectacle, after we have invited to the celebration of the great central American idea, of liberty and equal rights to all, the representatives of the crowned heads of Europe, who will be exponents of the great European idea of the divine right of kings and that the masses of mankind were created for the benefit of a few individuals, then to give them as a bill of fare the spread eagle, our "bird o' freedom," who soars higher, screams louder, sees farther, is the fiercest, strongest, the king indeed of all birds and wild fowl, in all his glory and in every variety of preparation? "Fee, fi, fo, fum," &c.

The critic or hypercritic may complain it is in questionable taste, but I will venture to carry the figure to the verge of the extreme absurd, and ask you to imagine for a moment an epilepsy of horror on the part of our favorite birds, ("done brown" on toast,) that by its suddenness shall unlock their sleep, the seals be taken off all pulses, and life and the frenzy of life, from erst lifeless forms on platters, tear into its wonted channels again; then could we in contemplation of this "vision too fearful of shuddering humanity on the brink of abysses," fail to recoil from affording an opportunity or possibility of the meeting of the "ineffable buzzards" of royalty and the screaming eagles of republicanism:

> Picture it, think of it, irresolute men;
> Support it, vote for it, if you can, then.

Mr. PHELPS. This conundrum, which has been so unexpectedly thrust upon me, involves considerations of such magnitude that, waiving a reply at the present moment, I take the privilege of the House and ask its consent to consider and print my reply.

It seems, too, a mistake to undertake to make this celebration a continued festival, looking for its success to that dazzling display of material wealth, luxury, and refinement which make the ordinary attractions of such an undertaking. For such pageantry, for such continued spectacular effects, our people have not the genius. We have already tried it and failed. In my opinion, our connection with every one in the past has been unfortunate, bringing us neither credit nor honor. Let us admit it.

The genius for holiday festival is not ours. It comes by tradition; it comes under other than free institutions. The tastes and habits of subjects and the resources of kings are needed, and such are the demands of the occasion, that even with these natural resources the exposition is generally a failure.

Why, then, should we attempt to do that for which we have no genius, for which we have no capacity? Why should we attempt to walk along this path strewn with the ruins of a hundred failures?

Why, Mr. Chairman, the United States are not honorable for their wealth and luxury, for their purple and fine linen. The continental powers of Europe have more wealth, have more luxury; much more purple and fine linen with which to deck the long-drawn aisles of their expositions. Here we cannot compete with them. But we have something which they have not; we have superior intelligence and virtue and patriotism; we have a better climate and better soil and a more bounteous nature; and we owe this intelligence, we owe this patriotism, we owe this virtue, we owe all the development of these natural resources to that civil and religious liberty which the fathers of 1776 declared.

Let us celebrate the anniversary of our independence in some way which will be a success, which is in accordance with the genius of our people and of our institutions, of which we need not be ashamed. Let us gather each citizen, with his wife and children, in social bands; let us bring with us our scholars, our poets, our orators, our priests; let the poets tell the story of the past, let the orators announce the achievements of the present, and let the priests, in recognition of divine benevolence and divine omnipotence, prophesy and pray for the safety and glory of the future. This will be a celebration worthy of the nation, and of which no man need be ashamed.

And here I would stop, but I am perfectly well aware that this House, consisting of the Representatives of the people, will take no interest in this celebration which I have just sketched, because they are not of it. They look at it as the play of Hamlet, with Hamlet omitted. Then come on; open the doors, and let in a "collection of intelligent statesmen;" let us have that centennial session at Philadelphia of which we have already heard. Let it be in Independence Hall. Let us gather there, and there renew the recollections of these familiar scenes under that sacred roof.

We shall all be there. My friend from Michigan, [Mr. FIELD,] the gentleman of the elegant toilet, until to-day unrivaled in this House, shall stand near the door; the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] shall roll the magnificent volume of his voice in the longest speech; the young man from Chicago [Mr. WARD] shall shake his gray locks, and there bore again the Sutro tunnel; my inquisitive friend on my left, the member from Printing-house Square [Mr. MELLISH] shall there obtain leave to print his last speech; my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] now unfortunately absent, the invariable friend of the poor man, shall be there with his untaxed tea, and shall exhibit the unpatented broidure on the satin slippers which hereafter every Essex plowman shall wear. And there, over and above all—and alas, he is absent to-day—my beloved friend from New York [Mr. COX] shall hover like a lonely cherub, distilling perpetual dew-drops of wit and fancy on an appreciative house.

And there, then, when the session shall draw to a close, if ever it shall draw to a close—and it would, for under the operation of the previous question we could close even that debate—when under the operation of the previous question, supported by a majority of the House, all this eloquence was ended, all the tears were shed; when those fishermen of Maine who had left their boats had made their offerings; when the greenbacks, battle-worn and blood-stained, had been nailed to the ceiling, then the Speaker, casting aside the microscope with which he was testing the parliamentary points of our acute brother from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] shall seize his golden gavel, and, enforcing silence, shall repeat not the old familiar cry of "Also," not the formal "Third reading of an engrossed bill," but summing it all up in the familiar phrase, "This bill has been read the third time; shall it pass?"—shall end the magnificent spectacle which I have endeavored to portray to this House, with the declaration "The bill is passed."

What bill?

A bill which will declare that from the 4th of July, 1876, gold and silver coin shall be the only legal tender in these United States of America.

And then, Mr. Chairman, on the motion to adjourn of any ambitious man who is willing to figure upon the record, this centennial session will disappear amid the plaudits of the assembled multitude—adjourned to the 4th of July, 1976.

The committee rose informally, and Mr. CESSNA took the chair as Speaker pro tempore to receive a

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 347) granting a portion of the United States military reservation at Salt Lake City for military purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

The bill (H. R. No. 3255) to establish an assay office at Helena, in the Territory of Montana; and

The bill (H. R. No. 3085) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain papers called for by resolution of the House.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits, and amendatory of the acts in relation thereto.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 766) to grant an American register to the steamship Suffolk, and to change the name of said steamship to that of Professor Morse.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. MCCORMICK obtained the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MCCORMICK] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I will do so.

Mr. RANDALL. A few moments since I was seized with a sudden impulse to say something, upon the conclusion of the editorial read by the Clerk, in which reflections were made upon gentlemen who feel sufficient interest in the matter to come to Washington to induce Congress by argument to make an appropriation of a sufficient sum to make this exposition a success. I fully appreciate the importance of a seat in this House. I deem it a great honor. I further appreciate the fact that there is in the Constitution of the United States a provision that says that no man here shall be questioned elsewhere for what he may state upon this floor; yet I think there should be a marked distinction in what ought to be said by members.

Now in this case these men referred to in the article which has been read in their public life stand above reproach. Those of them who occupied public station left it without a blemish, or any fault found by the people who intrusted them with public service. And furthermore, the assertion is not true that they come here to be paid their expenses out of the money of anybody else in this broad land. Every man who comes here does so at his own individual personal expense. I fear sometimes there is not lobby enough for this bill. Perhaps if it had been a steamship subsidy or a railroad land grant we should have had a mightier and more conclusive lobby than we have in connection with this bill. These men are actuated by but a single motive, that is, the impulse of patriotism.

Mr. MCCORMICK proceeded to address the committee; but before he had concluded

Mr. KELLEY said: If my friend from Arizona [Mr. MCCORMICK] would as lieve conclude his remarks this evening, after the recess, and will yield for that purpose, I will move that the committee now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has but fifteen minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. KELLEY. It is now ten minutes after five, and there is to be a session to-night. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. MCCORMICK. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 2986) to appropriate $3,000,000 in aid of the centennial celebration and international exhibition of 1876, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 498) to settle the accounts of Captain A. B. Dyer;

An act (H. R. No. 826) for the relief of Elias C. Boudinot;

An act (H. R. No. 2191) in relation to the customs duties on imported fruits;

An act (H. R. No. 3085) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain papers called for by resolution of the House; and

An act (H. R. No. 3255) to establish an assay office at Helena, in the Territory of Montana.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the House now take a recess.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. In order that the matter may be fully understood I would like the ruling of the Chair in reference to the transaction this evening of any business whatever.

The SPEAKER. The understanding is that no business of any kind shall be transacted.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. So that not even the course of this subject-matter can be fixed to-night?

The SPEAKER. Of course not.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. There can be nothing to debate?

The SPEAKER. Of course not. The understanding was that a session should be held this evening for debate in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that a recess should be taken for this purpose.

EXPORTATION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. BURCHARD. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table the bill to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits, in order that the amendments of the Senate may be non-concurred in and sent to a committee of conference.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. KELLEY that the House take a recess, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. O'NEILL taking the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the centennial-celebration bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2986) to appropriate $3,000,000 in aid of the centennial celebration and international exhibition of 1876.

[Mr. MCCORMICK resumed and concluded his remarks. [His speech in full will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if I could become eloquent beyond any of the gentlemen who have addressed the House on this subject, if I could say better and more patriotic words than any they have said, I cannot expect any applause, or bouquets, or cheers as I sit down. I am unfortunately, by the force of my judgment and from a sense of duty, found on that side of this question not calculated to inspire the grateful applause, the kindly looks and laurels, that have been showered upon some of the champions of this bill. I am on the side of cold, solid, and as I sometimes feel rather unpleasant facts. I find myself, therefore, restrained and embarrassed in attempting to talk upon the question before us; and though I confess to that sort of desire which most men feel who address public assemblies, the desire to have an audience, yet as what I shall say will be of a plain, practical character and be said more in justice to my own position than with any expectation of affecting the course of others upon this bill, I am rather glad that I am speaking to only a few; for I cannot be accused of talking upon the subject for any present effect, even if I possess the faculty of producing effect by any speeches that I may make.

At the outset, however, I may say very quietly that I have listened to the speeches upon this subject with decided interest. I am glad to find that there are so many gentlemen who still love the memories that cluster around the birth of the Republic. I am glad to find so many men who desire by some act to consolidate and perpetuate and extend that feeling. I claim to belong to that class of men myself. Modestly I may be permitted to say that I yield to none in my love and devotion to the grand doctrines enunciated and put into practical effect in the Government of a people about one hundred years ago. I have learned all my life to respect and revere the principles, the doctrines, the form, the Government, the political philosophy which had their birth at that time. I come from a country which yields to none in its devotion to the grand ideas that have been so eloquently talked about here. I come from a people who are second to none in the sacrifices they have made to place the liberties, the birth of which took place nearly one hundred years ago, on a firm basis, where they shall live and grow to bless mankind as long I hope as the world stands. History records that the people whom I represent have never been backward in their response to any call that has been made upon them; they have done every duty in that regard and met every demand.

This discussion has developed the fact, as I have intimated, that there are a great many men on the floor of Congress, and certainly many elsewhere, who think it would be a glorious thing to have a grand celebration on the one hundredth anniversary of American independence. Well, to say that it would not be would be a sad kind of remark. It would be, I concede. I trust that every heart will beat lighter, that the blood of every man throughout the length and breadth of the land will course more freely, when the day arrives at the recollection that it is the hundredth anniversary of the birth of the nation which has protected and blessed us as a people. But, Mr. Chairman, while I concede all this, there are behind it and underlying it facts, outside of those presented here to-day, which make it impossible for me, however much I may desire to add to the glory of the day, to vote one dollar of money for any such purpose.

First, Mr. Chairman, (and I call attention to this point in all candor,) there is no constitutional power for any such action.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I would rather not. I presume I shall answer the gentleman's question without his asking it. I rather think I anticipate it, and I prefer to take my own course.

I assert, and in fact nobody has claimed the contrary, that there is no power in Congress under the Constitution to vote money for any such purpose.

The Constitution was never framed for the purpose of authorizing Congress to vote away the money of the people for any such purpose. What does it say?

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States; to borrow money on the credit of the United States; to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes; to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States; to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures; to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States; to establish post-offices and post-roads; to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

And so on and so on. Nowhere is there any clause giving to Congress the power to vote away the money of the people for any sentiment, however grand that sentiment may be.

I stand then, in the first place, upon this proposition: Believing the instrument from which I have read controls my action in this respect, I hold there is no warrant for me to vote one dollar for any such purpose. Just as well and just as properly may Congress vote to pay for the fire-works which gentlemen are in the habit of burning in their own yards for the amusement of their children on the night of each recurring Fourth of July.

I know I am to be answered, and I anticipate my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will wish to ask me whether some such thing has not been done before. I say it is true; and I suppose I may be met in reference to the question of power just as a justice of the peace met it when it was proposed to institute before him proceedings for divorce, and one party came and objected there was no jurisdiction on the part of the court. "It is no use to talk to me about that," said the justice of the peace; "I know I have the power; I have done it time and again." I take it, on that kind of authority there is a precedent for voting away this money.

I admit, so far as I am familiar with the legislation of the country, there have been frequent occasions perhaps when Congress appropriated money as much open to the objection which I have made as this is, but that does not change the fact. I have not voted for any such appropriation that I remember of, and I will not vote for this one.

That, then, Mr. Chairman, if I had been in doubt in other respects, will be sufficient to determine my course in reference to this bill. But there are other considerations presented to-day, and I have heard them with somewhat of sorrow. I have felt that they have been unjustly uttered. I have heard eloquent gentlemen get up and talk about dishonoring the country by refusing to vote for this appropriation.

Now, I may say again modestly that I will yield to none in my desire to carry out the obligations of the country to the utmost; and I do not state that which is more than true when I say the people I have the honor to represent as dearly treasure the honor of this country as the constituents of any gentleman upon this floor. I repel, therefore, the idea of my doing that which would dishonor the nation by refusing to vote an appropriation to carry out the project of the gentlemen who have inaugurated this grand centennial scheme. No, Mr. Chairman; there is no such element of dishonor in it.

I know it is claimed by some that an effort has been made to entrap Congress into an appropriation of money, but it is denied by others. I neither admit nor deny it, but I state that I do not care.

I wish to discuss this on the merits of the bill presented to me as a member of Congress, without regard to what any man may have done. We have all heard what has been read to the House so repeatedly to-day, and I will not again have it read. I say for myself when it is argued, as it has been argued here, that notwithstanding it was said in the original law the Government should not be liable, which was not published, and the President of the United States issued a proclamation inviting other nations, which was published, by reason of these things we are committed to this scheme—I for one say it does not weigh with me. I do not believe we are committed to it. It stands before Congress as an original proposition on its merits alone, without regard to committals heretofore made. There has been no law making an appropriation, and nobody is committed or had a right to assume that any appropriation would be made until the Congress of the United States had made it. I say they had no right to assume any appropriation would be made for it, because there is no warrant in the Constitution for it. I do not care about that argument. I agree, as contended by some of the friends of the scheme, that there has been no committal. I do not care whether there has been a committal or not. This is a proposition which will cost $3,000,000 to carry out. That is all there is of it.

If I believed the Government of the United States had been committed solemnly by its acts, by competent authority, I should look upon it with more care. I should like to see no faith so plighted broken, but this is not one of those schemes anyhow where, if the Government were committed, it could not refuse to carry out without dishonor. There are many things which it is more honorable to back out of—"to go back on," as we say in the West—than to go through with.

And if the Government in a time when it had money, when the people were employed, when we enjoyed the blessings of abundance, when the blessings of plenty were spread all over the land—if acting upon a generous impulse it at that time, in view of the industries that were all alive, and of the abundance of prosperity throughout the land—if acting upon that impulse and under such circumstances it had committed itself to such a thing as this, now, in the changed condition of affairs, it would be less dishonorable to stop where we are than it would be to go on and spend the money.

So I take leave of that part of the argument and go on to consider some of the other arguments which have been adduced here. I cannot fail to remember, Mr. Chairman, the patriotic appeal made, especially by one of the gentlemen on the floor this day, which was so touching and moving—that made by my friend the distinguished Representative from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] And I feel that it would be almost cruel, and perhaps it is, for me, in view of that appeal, to call attention to some cold facts which underlie this case. I had a namesake who once became immortal because of the wonderful things he used to say and the patriotic things he did; and you will remember that he once said how willing he was to enlist all his wife's relatives in the war, and sacrifice them if necessary on the battle-fields of the country. And I thought perhaps it might be the same with the sentiment of the gentleman from Maine, my weeping friend, who I wish were here to-night, because I love him and respect him. Taking up one of the books which are printed here I find that during the last year the district represented by the gentleman from Maine paid internal-revenue taxation to the amount of $27,868.33 into the national Treasury. I looked further, and I found that the district from which I come paid during the last year $6,798,288.11 into the national Treasury. When I compared these figures I felt that it was easier for him to be sentimental than it was for me. When I remember the burden of taxation under which my people labor; when I remember the great efforts they are making, day and night, for the purpose of accumulating these funds to pay them into the Treasury of the United States, if I had felt there had been warrant in the Constitution for making this appropriation I should hesitate before I agreed to add another dollar to the taxation of the already overburdened people whom it is my privilege to represent and who are among the most energetic and enterprising people on the earth, yielding to none in their devotion to their country and in their willingness to make sacrifices in every fair and reasonable way for the perpetuity of the liberties which we enjoy.

But I went further, and I found that during the whole period of the last eleven years, in which we have experienced in this country what the burden of taxation really meant, the second district of Maine paid the enormous sum of $3,030,012.94 into the national Treasury. I looked again, and I found that the district from which I came during the same period had paid $60,509,735.24 into the national Treasury. I then proceeded to look over the book to see who they were that were advocating the passage of this bill in this Congress, and I found that with few exceptions—and I say it with the utmost kindness, for I have feelings only of kindness toward the gentlemen who are advocating the bill—I found that those who were advocating the passage of this bill did not represent as a rule constituencies here upon this floor that contributed any large proportion of the taxes. As regards the city of New York and the great State of New York, I am advised that their Representatives are divided on the subject. It is not advocated by the West, from which so large a proportion of the revenues of the Government is drawn. My own State particularly contributed last year more than all of New England together, and yet we have not money enough hardly to get along with. I found that the districts of the country whose Representatives are advocating this jubilee are not districts which are loaded down as we are in the West with this great burden of taxation. The State of Ohio, the State of Illinois, and the other Western States—I think I can speak at least for my own State—feel to-day that every dollar of unnecessary taxation added to the load which they now carry is a thing which ought to be averted if it can be done.

I desire to commend these facts to my weeping and sentimental friend from Maine, and I ask him if I am not justified in saying that he can afford to be sympathetic and sentimental when he talks of expending $3,000,000 on the grand jubilee at Philadelphia, since his own people contribute so very small a percentage of what it is proposed shall be expended there?

But I dislike to leave this branch of the subject without referring further to the position of the people whom I represent. The people of the West are patriotic. They believe in the perpetuity of this Union. They have fought for it, and will fight for it again if need be; but they insist, and I think justly, that we shall not fritter away their moneys on behalf of a sentiment, however dear it may be to everybody in all the land.

These, Mr. Chairman, are some more of the reasons why I cannot vote for this bill. Then there are other considerations which have presented themselves to my mind. Since I have been here I have been impressed with the magnitude of the interests controlled by this Congress. As a new member I have desired, like the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] to adopt that mode which should promote economy and cut off expenditures in every possible way, and add no new burden to those already borne by our people. What do I see? There are appeals which come up here and reach us in these halls which cannot be ignored. I have heard in this city within the past few days the appeal of the laboring men who have done this magnificent work in our capital here asking us to pay them the money they earned in paving these streets, and claiming, with how much right I will not undertake to say, that Congress is committed to the payment of them; at least it is stated by many of them that Congress is committed to foot the bills for the grand and magnificent work which has been done in this city. Sir, I have heard the cries of the workingmen here, who are knocking at the doors of this Hall and asking for the money to pay their wages long since earned in accomplishing this work.

I have heard in this Hall appeals made to me, which I could not and did not resist, to pay the teachers of this District; and it was claimed that the Government was committed to their payment also. The very gentleman from Maine who talked to-day so flippantly about dishonor, and told us about his sentiments, and how he shed tears on certain occasions, appealed to me to vote to pay the school-teachers of this District; and I voted with him.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNNELL. Did not a procession of workingmen in the city of Chicago the other day walk to the common-council room and demand bread?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I will answer the gentleman. I shall come to my own community pretty soon. I do not know in what spirit the question is asked, and I do not care.

Sir, I say I have listened to these cries. The gentleman from Maine talks to us about national dishonor, and flippantly tells us that we are not bankrupt. Let him put his hand into the pockets of his own people and take out millions to put into the public Treasury; let them feel the burden of taxation as we have felt it. He talks about the fishermen on his coast giving their nets and their boats and their catches for this purpose. Sir, that is all fol-de-rol. Who will be at this celebration? The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] described them. Sir, there will not be a single fisherman from the whole State of Maine there, nor a single fisherman from my home, for we have Maine fishermen there, and they desire to keep their boats and their nets and their catches, and are not disposed to contribute them in order to indulge gentlemen in worshiping a sentiment, however dear it may be to the American people.

Sir, I have heard these cries that have come up here, and I do not know but that I will vote to pay the laborers of Washington; I will vote to pay them every dollar before I will vote to pay one cent for any such pageant and show as that proposed to be gotten up at Philadelphia.

Sir, what else do we hear? Not long since the Father of Waters—the great Mississippi, which stretches from the far north to the gulf, and bordering which lie the richest lands of the earth, on which the cotton and the sugar of the country are raised, and must be raised throughout all time—overflowed its banks, and to-day what do we behold? The destroying floods are to-day raging and carrying death and destruction over a territory larger than the States of Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Vermont combined, sweeping away from the face of the earth every vestige of human improvement and every home, and driving out the poor dwellers there as wanderers, suffering and starving, into the wilderness along down that great river. These three million dollars which you propose to appropriate here for the purpose of building a memorial hall, and of having a grand time drinking wine and inviting the nobodies and the somebodies from abroad, and showing them your achievements in the arts and sciences—these three million dollars would help to wall up the waters of that great river and give to the centennial celebration a country redeemed from the flood, which would be a far greater blessing to mankind than any that you can confer by carrying out this affair at Philadelphia.

I call attention to that fact; and I am ready, for one, to say that if for the purpose of redeeming these lands from the waste of waters I must vote money, I will do it cheerfully. I would rather build as a monument to the one hundredth anniversary of American independence a dike that will forever turn back the destroying flood, than to build a monument down here at Philadelphia for the amusement and pleasure of the people who may congregate there.

Now I go further on. It is but a short time since that I had occasion to leave this city and go to my home. The road over which I traveled for nearly a thousand miles runs through the best and most populous portion of the country. It runs along a line of villages and towns where are found more manufactures and more wealth than can be found along the line of any other road I know of running from the sea-board to the center of the continent. During that trip I saw sights that made my heart sick. I saw gathered around the depots, as I passed through the manufacturing towns, the gaunt faces and forms of men who but a short time before had been employed in the now-closed factories. I could hear their cry come up for help. I could feel all through me the necessity of this Government doing something by which to reopen those industrial establishments of the land, and set those thousands upon thousands of unemployed laborers again at work, and give them that which would supply the wants of themselves and their families.

At last I reached my immediate home, to which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] has referred; the city of which I speak with becoming modesty, and I trust with becoming pride. Gentlemen will pardon me for feeling a little sentiment; I will make no boast of it or of the tears which might flow in connection with the history of the place which I represent. I reached that city, and I wish that you all had seen it as I saw it, and then ask me if I can justify myself in voting a dollar for the centennial celebration or for any other celebration in the land. I found there industrial establishments closed; I found thousands of men unemployed. Hard winter was upon us. It is true that our granaries were full; we had a bountiful harvest; and we have been enabled, by doing what we could, to carry most of them through the winter in some way without great actual suffering. But they now look into the dark future with an eye that sees no hope.

The gentleman asks me about the processions which were formed there. I will tell him, and I am glad of the opportunity to tell him, that the reports which have gone over the country with reference to that procession are, as a rule, unmitigated falsehoods. I am glad of an opportunity here in the Congress of the United States to say in behalf of that people that the stories which have been circulated with regard to their conduct are not true.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. BURLEIGH. How about the closing of the mills and factories in the country?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I do not know to what the gentleman refers.

Mr. BURLEIGH. You said that when you went to the West you saw the factories closed.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Yes, I said so.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I did not know but that might be as much of a story as the other.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. They are not all closed; I did not say they were. A percentage of them were shut up. I do not insist that they were all closed, but they are closing now. If gentlemen will read the dispatches that come over the wires from time to time, they will see that those factories continue to be closed from day to day. A large percentage of the employés of the factories which I saw on my way home are out of employment, as they are in my own city. And it was in reference to my own city that I was speaking when I was asked the question which I do not even now see the point of. I am thankful for an opportunity to dissipate the rumors which have been circulated in regard to my people. It is true a procession of men did form; I saw it, for I happened to be at home at the time during the holidays. A procession did form and marched down to the city headquarters. But they marched as orderly and quietly as gentlemen go from here to their homes. There was no demonstration, no riot, no threat of bloodshed, nothing of the kind; and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] who asks the question is entirely misinformed if he understands that there was anything of that sort. Of course there was more or less noise, as there always is where there is a gathering of men; and there were some foolish demagogues there who harangued them and attempted to get them to do what should not be done. But the men had sense enough to behave themselves like men. They asked for work; they did not demand blood, as has been stated. They asked for work because the industrial establishments in which they had been engaged were closed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, can I after witnessing these things and knowing these facts, though feeling the deepest pride in the welfare of my country—can I vote $3,000,000 for the purpose of a celebration at Philadelphia during the year 1876?

Mr. Chairman, I believe I have said all I desire to say. I have stated that I had no feeling of unkindness toward anybody connected with this scheme. I have no doubt they are actuated by what they deem to be proper motives in all that they say, and that they do nothing but what they deem correct and proper to be done. But for my part, looking upon this picture, feeling as I feel, hearing as I hear through my constituents of the depression and want abroad in the land, it does not seem to me that even if we possessed the power it is now a proper time for us to vote one dollar unnecessarily from the revenues of this Government. No. Now what the people need, and that which, if you do it, (I did not say that I would do it,) would be a grander monument and one which would bless the people of all your cities and towns infinitely more than the building of twenty such institutions as will be this at Philadelphia, would be to appropriate this money toward the building of roads or the digging of canals, which shall take our surplus products and bring back your wares. We need such means of transportation. There is a demand in the country for means of transportation, cheaper, better, and more extensive than any we now have. There is a demand for employment; there is a demand for help all over the land. There is nowhere in all the country, so far as I have heard, any demand of the people that money shall be voted for the purpose of this celebration (anniversary, though it be, of our national birth and independence) at Philadelphia. Philadelphia! God bless her! I do not suppose that her Representatives will take unkindly any word that I may speak of her. Pennsylvania! God bless her, too! And bless the memories that cluster around the grand old "Quaker City." I for one pledge my faith, and the faith of all the men I represent, to stand by her and the grand principles to which she has ever been faithful and true in the government of this country. I will join you in the celebration of that anniversary; but I will not join you in the celebration at that place. My people will celebrate it at home; they will celebrate it on the prairies of the West. The people will celebrate it all over the country. Gentlemen here deceive themselves when they speak of that celebration at Philadelphia as being a national affair, if that implies that the nation is to be there. They are anticipating what will not turn out to be true in fact. Not one in ten of my constituents, not one in ten of all the constituents of gentlemen here from other States than those immediately adjacent, will witness the grand work that you will do there with the $3,000,000 proposed now to be appropriated. Not one in ten of the constituents of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] who spoke so eloquently here to-day, will ever see the grand temple to be erected there. Not one in ten of the miners who make up the constituency of my friend from Arizona, [Mr. MCCORMICK,] not one in ten of all the people in all the land, will ever witness that anniversary at Philadelphia during the year of jubilee you propose to inaugurate there; yet you talk about it as if it were to be a benefit and a blessing to everybody.

I concede that these international exhibitions have been perhaps productive of good in times past. I do not know (I have heard the argument advanced here to-day, and there is something in it) whether this is the proper way anyhow for us to undertake the celebration of the anniversary of our birth as a nation; I doubt it. I will contribute, my State will contribute, my district will contribute toward an international exposition. A year ago we had an anniversary, (pardon me for referring to the fact, as it illustrates the energy of the people I have the honor to represent better than anything else can,) an anniversary that we remember distinctly, for we have all gone through the terrible ordeal. We desired a national exposition, and we had one. We went to work and in sixty days we raised nearly half a million dollars; we built upon the lake shore one of the finest buildings that to-day stands on the American continent. We had a jolly time there for a month; and we never thought of asking Congress or anybody else to contribute to it.

One word more and I am done. If in the course of this discussion I have said anything which would imply on my part any feeling of unkindness toward the men engaged in this enterprise, I have done that which I did not intend. I desire to enter my protest against what I deem to be a wrong to the people, a wrong to the national Treasury, a wrong to those who are toiling to-day to put into the Treasury the money which this bill proposes to take out and appropriate for this purpose.

Mr. MYERS obtained the floor and said: I yield for a moment to my friend from Arizona, [Mr. MCCORMICK.]

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, no doubt my eloquent friend from Illinois [Mr. WARD] is sincere in all he has said; but, as a sequel to his remarks, I wish to read an extract from a newspaper published in his own city of Chicago—the Inter-Ocean, of May 2—but three or four days ago. In that paper I find a lengthy editorial in favor of the centennial celebration, from which I read the following:

> But it is estimated that it will require eight to ten million dollars to carry forward the celebration on the scale projected by the managers. Hence the finance board appeal to Congress for an appropriation, and to State and city governments for appropriations, and to citizens of all parts of the country to subscribe for stock.

And then comes this language, to which I call the gentleman's special attention:

> That this appeal will be liberally responded to there can be but little doubt. The centennial commends itself to the patriotism and the pride of every American citizen.

This certainly shows that the matter of a congressional appropriation is not altogether unpopular in Chicago. The editorial referred to is thus concluded:

> Not to celebrate the hundredth birthday of the nation is to forget how much liberty cost; to forget the heroes of 1776 and of 1864. Not to celebrate it grandly is to disregard our real importance among the nations of the world and to belittle the American name on the pages of history.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, should I realize the wish of living until the time of the centennial exhibition I expect that one of the first men I shall meet there will be my eloquent friend from Chicago [Mr. WARD] who has but now so stoutly opposed an appropriation to make it a success, and with him will be thousands of his constituents. The way to combat this proposition is not to appeal to passion or prejudice. I cannot forget, Mr. Chairman, (and I hope it will not be considered unkind in me to refer to the fact,) that a brief two years ago the Congress of the United States removed the duties from articles intended for Chicago, then being rebuilt after her terrible conflagration, and instantly voted $4,000,000 for public buildings there in order to help her suffering people. I cannot forget that the purses of the citizens of Philadelphia were opened, as they were through the land, to assist those who were stricken by that calamity, nor after his fervid appeals for kindness to others as against the just request contained in this measure can I fail to remember in behalf of Philadelphia that the citizen soldiery, whose memory of her volunteer refreshment saloons is yet as fresh as ever, will not charge her people with omitting either to be just or generous.

Sir, if people have suffered by inundations I will be among the first to vote them money or supplies. I have not heard any such proposition coming from the gentleman from Chicago. But let me tell him that if men are out of employment (and many are so all over the land, I am sorry to say) the way to give them work is to foster our industries and stimulate new enterprises in order to supply the labor they want. If he thinks the laboring men of this country, the men who are its bone and sinew, who help to make its wealth, are opposed to this enterprise, he sadly mistakes those who, though not able to give the money which is needed, know what it is to care for the honor and glory of the country, and his appeal to their prejudices will be in vain.

Mr. Chairman, if I thought that the centennial celebration was to be a mere local Philadelphia affair, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] would have us believe, I should be silent to-day.

The declaration of our independence was not any more for all the people of America than the nation's commemoration of its hundredth birthday will redound to the honor and glory of all its citizens.

Years mark the progress in the life of man; centuries have always been pointed to in illustrating the development of the great nations of the earth. The American Republic, which in its first hundred years has done more for mankind than was accomplished in all the ages which preceded it, cannot afford to let the celebration of this event pass without participation by the Government itself, and even so it has been ordained by law. The other anniversaries of the day have been fitly kept by expressions of joy, by orations, by illuminations and bonfires and friendly greetings; but for this great event it was properly adjudged that the people of the United States should exhibit the natural resources of the country and their developments, and its progress in those arts which benefit mankind in comparison with those of older nations, and that an exhibition of American and foreign arts, products, and manufactures should be held under the auspices of the Government in the city of Philadelphia. It is too late now to discuss whether we are to have such an exhibition. That was debated and adopted by Congress in 1871. It is too late to question its international feature. That is written all over the original law, and in the act of 1872, which created the board of finance to provide measures for carrying it out.

These measures have proved but a partial success, and the only question before us is one of governmental financial aid.

The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] going back to the origin of the movement, says it was promised that such aid would never be asked. That is a mistake, for the first bill contemplated a half million from the Government. At that early day this was thought not to be requisite, and the advocates of the measure were content to have the superintending aid and auspices of the Government, under which alone an international exhibition could be a success. No such promise as he states was made by the Representatives from Philadelphia. I have my own remarks before me now, and there are no such words or intimation in them. But suppose that either here or in the Senate it had been stated that Philadelphia and Pennsylvania would bear the chief burden of the expense. That certainly was the expectation then, and never was promise more faithfully fulfilled.

Two million dollars from the citizens of Philadelphia; one million and a half from the city, one million from the State! It is a record to be proud of, and without a parallel.

Congress in 1872—understanding that no locality could be expected to pay the whole cost; recognizing the enterprise as a national one, in which, under the organic act, every State and Territory was represented, upon the nomination of its governor, by appointment of the President—passed a law, which I had the honor to report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, creating the centennial board of finance, in order to secure the necessary subscriptions from every part of the Union. Three years in advance seemed too early to thousands who did not comprehend the magnitude of the work, and just as the plans were being perfected and the importance of early action began to be understood a financial panic swept over the country, taking away all hope of obtaining large subscriptions outside of the limits of Pennsylvania.

Not until then was Congress appealed to, and not until the Senate debate about the wording of our invitations to foreign powers could the people have dreamed that there was danger to the progress of this great undertaking. When that news reached Philadelphia there was an outpouring of her people such as had not occurred in years. Men are frequently moved by the excitement of politics or the question of personal gain. There was no such motive cause here. The poor had given their mite, the rich their thousands; all were represented. Thousands of stalwart men from the workshops, bearing banners, marched to a gathering, where the question was one of country, of national honor, and the celebration of an event which gave liberty to millions and proclaimed the dignity of labor to every people. Another million dollars came of that meeting.

Pardon me if I have thought this tribute to our good faith necessary; and now let us see whether a step backward may not violate the pledges of the law, and, to use the language of the gentleman from Maine, "smirch the national honor."

The pledge was unmistakable, understood by all, that this exhibition should be held in 1876 and under the auspices of the Government in order that the people of the whole country should participate in it; that the commission should report to Congress its plans of building, classification of articles, and proposed ceremonies of opening and dedication. The nation has a right, then, to prevent its abandonment, which, thank God, is not contemplated. But more than that, in the title of both bills the exhibition is called "international," and the provisions are for such a purpose; among others "the requisite custom-house regulations for the introduction into this country of the articles from foreign countries intended for exhibition," the proclamation of the President through the Department of State, and the requirement that the President shall notify the diplomatic representatives of all nations.

Will any sane man contend that this is not an invitation to foreign powers, and that having made the proclamation and given the notice, which in good faith has been accepted by thirteen nations, we can without disgrace withdraw this invitation and by implication annul the laws we have solemnly enacted?

Ah! but the gentleman says the first-class powers have not accepted. Is not Germany a first-class power? And are we to wait until all the nations of the earth have accepted? But for this higgling about the invitation England and France would have long since signified officially the intention they have to be represented. But we are committed by our own acts. The United States took part in the three great expositions at London, Paris, and Vienna. It would be an insult to hold such an exhibition and not invite the people there and in other lands to participate. From this there can be no escape.

Our centennial was a common theme with the skilled artisans and prominent men of Europe during the past exposition summer. Germany had resolved to hold one about the year 1876, but postponed it because of ours.

The disgrace of failure would be upon the Government, but the bitter disappointment would belong to the people of both hemispheres.

Is there to-day an American who wishes to wipe these laws from our statute-book and make our exhibition a failure? I do not believe it. In every valley and by every stream and hill-side of the land it is already the theme in the family circle. Americans from almost every fireside expect to be there with illustrations of their industry and of the country's development, in a common rejoicing such as history has never chronicled before. Is it not, then, worth while to make this appropriation of three millions even if it gave no hope of a moneyed return?

Think of it! That would have been but a dollar each for the people of the infant Colonies, and it is not eight cents apiece for every inhabitant now—Pennsylvania having also to bear her share.

It is said this may lead to further appropriations. Not at all. With the amount already guaranteed and the receipts of the exhibition, this will cover every expense, although it will not stop the subscriptions. The very provision which has been complained of secures the Government. It was wisely placed in these laws that the Government should not be liable for the expenses of the exhibition or the liquidation of the debts incurred in its creation.

This appropriation is a national gift for a national object, and as its payment—carefully guarded by the provisions of the bill—will run in installments through two years, the money will be raised as readily as the other millions appropriated for the purposes of the Government.

I claim, however, Mr. Chairman, that this expenditure will be returned to us tenfold. Our participation in the three great world's fairs was of incalculable benefit to us. The international features of each gave them their wonderful interest. And so here the great interest will center in the comparison of our own arts, products, and manufactures with those of the countries of the Old World, rendered not less attractive by a more intimate knowledge of their costumes and customs, and their development in literature, science, and art.

In the finer arts and fabrics, and in many practical results of science, we shall learn by the contact, and advance with more rapid strides. In mechanism and all that is of most use and comfort we shall bear the palm, as before, to the material welfare of the people, while the enticements of our freedom, our educational advancement, and cheap homesteads will by this means allure thousands of skilled laborers to seek our shores and aid in the development of our natural wealth.

I have said elsewhere, and cannot do better than repeat, that the knowledge we acquired of the Bessemer process of making steel at the French exposition was so valuable that Mr. Hewitt tells us the cost of our part in it did not weigh as a grain in the estimate.

The manufacture of beet-sugar in the workshops of France has almost reached perfection, and from the drawings in the Paris exposition reports, printed by Congress, several establishments were at once erected in California.

Another result was largely to introduce asphalt and bitumen pavements here; also, the sinking of shafts by the Belgian method, as in the sulphur locality of Louisiana. I mention these as a few illustrations of advantage to our own country; but these are nothing to the benefits resulting from the knowledge abroad of our wonderful advance in the useful arts. The demand for American machinery and for our fine tools and agricultural implements has increased immensely since these expositions. Almost every American article of machinery exhibited at Vienna was purchased at once, and many orders given for more. A preparation of starch sent by us to one of the earlier exhibitions produced a large demand for it, and not then so great as for an article of food we displayed at Paris prepared from corn, called maizena, which has had an immense sale abroad.

Take our native wines as an illustration. Their exhibition at Paris first brought those from California into celebrity. At Vienna the wines from Ohio, New York, Saint Louis, and California took seven premiums, and these were followed by large orders for them abroad.

The display of American leather at Vienna, for which we took six premiums, is resulting in an unprecedented export of it to England; and remember that at all these world's fairs our representation was as nothing in comparison with the opportunities we shall have in 1876.

Is it not strange that some of these carpers at our constitutional powers could find it "for the general welfare" to expend money and take part nationally in these foreign exhibitions as well as in expeditions for the interest of science and humanity, yet can see neither law nor reason for the grander one at home?

How can these illustrations of the industries, these results of inventive genius, these proofs from the field and the mine of our natural wealth and skilled labor, fail to bring material prosperity, employment to those who are out of work, and give a solid return to the revenues of the country? Not the least of these benefits will be a new impetus to commerce, which must carry between the nations the products thus purchased from each other.

Ships will not be built if there is little to carry. We cannot fill our coffers by mutual rejoicings over our greatness and shutting the door against the world. Twenty years ago Perry opened Japan to our commerce. Ten years ago our imports from that country amounted to $1,000,000 per year. Now they are ten millions a year, while our exports to them amount to millions; and let me say that China and Japan alone, these great empires of the East with which our trade is growing immense, will, at the centennial as a necessary result of the knowledge of our advancement which naught else can teach so well, more than repay to our people the whole cost of the exhibition. Five thousand Americans will in 1876 abstain from foreign travel and circulate in our own country enough money to pay for the entire expense. In 1861, at the London Crystal Palace, there were five hundred exhibitors from the United States alone, at Paris seven hundred, at Vienna nine hundred and seventy. Here we shall have thousands of exhibitors from other lands and thousands of others who will visit every portion of this country.

Whether as a question of honor or interest, I appeal to you as Representatives of a people whose hearts and judgments are in favor of this celebration not to let it be dwarfed by a mistaken economy. Fail it cannot and must not!

Let the peoples of the world learn the resources and civilization of that Republic which, of all governments in the annals of time, has given the greatest good to the greatest number, and learn fresh aspirations from our history. Let the men who lately were in the conflict of civil war come together in the bonds of a reunited country destined, we believe, to secure the blessings of liberty to the latest generations, and forgetting the trials and sufferings through which they have passed, seek only to recall the common memories and glories of the Revolution.

Mr. Chairman, upon the old bell in Independence Hall the strangely prophetic words were inscribed years before it rang them out to the world, "Proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof." They are from the twenty-fifth chapter, tenth verse of Leviticus, which reads also:

> And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year: * * * it shall be a jubilee unto you.

The fiftieth anniversary of our independence received no great national celebration. Perhaps it was well; for there was still an element of discord among us, now happily gone forever. Perhaps it was well; for on that day died John Adams and Thomas Jefferson, whose lives and deaths fitly illustrated the great event. But I appeal to you once more, Representatives of the American people, let our hundredth birthday be properly celebrated, not only to honor the glorious promise of our origin and the grandeur of our attainment, but to dignify us among the nations of the earth.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I rise on this occasion rather to express the deep interest which, as an American and as an Alabamian, I feel in the subject under consideration than to make any formal speech. As I was approaching the Capitol but a while since, passing along the streets, I heard the chiming of the bells, and as I got nearer I recognized that they were ringing "Hail Columbia." By an easy transition my thoughts swept over our country, and the reflection pressed upon my mind that over our vast territorial domain, in every city, in every town, and in every hamlet, there was or might be ringing forth the tones of the church-going bell, calling upon the people to exercise the highest privilege which any government can bestow, that of worshiping God each according to the dictates of his own conscience; and I feel that every American might well join in sympathy with the ringing of the chimes, and exultingly exclaim, "Hail Columbia, happy land."

And, sir, to whom do we owe this unprecedented, this exalted condition? To what is it traceable? To the event which we propose to commemorate and the men who proclaimed the Declaration of American Independence.

Looking at this subject from this point alone, I confess I have no hesitancy as to what my action shall be, and as to what I think ought to be the action of the American Congress, nor as to what action will alone secure the approbation of a great and magnanimous people.

Why, sir, we are told we should not pass this bill providing for the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the nation's birthday, as though it was some ordinary event. I put it to gentlemen, when was it in the history of the world any nation ever proposed to celebrate its one hundredth birthday? Look back along the pages of history and tell me where in its remotest search we can find any nation which had grown to consideration in wealth and power such as prompted it at the end of one hundred years to celebrate its centennial as a national jubilee. We propose to celebrate that anniversary of the United States of America as a day notable in our own life as a nation and an epoch in the history of man, by calling together the people from the thirty-seven States and the Territories of the Union, and by the convocation of all nations, for a common exhibition in all the useful arts of the inventions and improvements of a civilization unequaled in developed industries in the annals of the world.

Rome was one hundred and fifty years old when she entered upon her wars with the Samnites, the first manifestation of that spirit of aggression upon her neighbors which led her in the course of ages to be the conqueror and the mistress of the world. The Grecian states had passed through thirteen centuries of obscurity before they inaugurated the expedition in which Agamemnon, "king of men," led forth the Grecian heroes to avenge the wrongs of Menelaus. This event, the celebration of which is contemplated by the bill under consideration, is unexampled in the history of the world, and one which might well be the subject for the profoundest and, as I conceive, the most grateful reflection on the part of the entire American people.

But, Mr. Chairman, what is the character of the objections we hear made to this bill and this celebration? I could not but be impressed with it. I hear gentlemen here haggling over the dollars and cents which it will cost. Not a hundred years ago the men met in Independence Hall, in the city of Philadelphia, who bore within their true hearts and in their exalted spirits the fate of this nation and the destinies of the world. Did they talk about their not being able to pay? Did they derisively ask where the money was to come from to sustain their noble efforts for the deliverance of the American people from tyranny and oppression? Did they not know that they were incurring expense? Did any man in that assembly attempt to interpose a question like that which was put yesterday by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] "Where is the money to come from?" Did any man in that assembly talk about gold, as we heard to-day from the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS?] When I heard his remarks about the mode in which he thought the centennial would most honorably and successfully culminate, I was strongly reminded of another occasion in the history of this country, one familiar to you all. It was on the occasion of the delivery of the celebrated speech of Patrick Henry, when he described the exultant scenes which followed the successful termination of our protracted and often doubtful war of the Revolution, when he pictured a free people rejoicing over a country disenthralled and made independent, and when, in the midst of the firing of guns and the ringing of bells and the shouts of the rejoicing multitude, there was heard the hoarse voice of an Army contractor crying out "Beef!" "Beef!" "Beef!" Sir, I say to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] his cry to-day is the same cry. He comes here, and in the midst of the preparation for the great event of the anniversary of the independence of this country he cries out "Gold!" "Gold!" "Gold!" That, to his mind, is the one thing needful, which is to postpone all else, to constrain and prevent the American people from celebrating as a nation the anniversary of this the most significant event in its history, and one of the most important in the calendar of time.

I admire the earnestness and the ability with which the gentleman presses his financial schemes; but I submit that there are other things that are good and worthy the consideration of an American Congress, besides a "resumption of specie payments."

Now, sir, to recur for one moment to the scene to which I have called attention, and to those who were the actors in that grandest drama of human action. What would Hancock think of the question propounded yesterday by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts? What would Gerry and Jefferson and Carroll and Sherman and Franklin, and all that illustrious assembly that was gathered there—what would they think, could they know that we were questioning and canvassing whether we would celebrate the centennial of the day consecrated by them to liberty; whether the American people, the recipients of its inestimable blessings, shall celebrate it or decline to celebrate it, because it may involve the expenditure by the nation of a few million dollars?

The gentleman from the Chicago district [Mr. WARD] says that he and his constituents cannot bear this expenditure; and he made a remark which I think was scarcely consistent with his usual fairness, that he has observed that those constituencies which pay the least into the Treasury of the United States are the most fervid or the most eager in behalf of the passage of this bill. He proclaims rather vauntingly that Chicago pays a large proportion of the taxes of this Government. Now, how is it that Chicago pays that large proportion of the taxes? Under what auspices has she reached the point that she is able to do so? Fifty years ago Chicago could only boast of a few log huts; and if she will just exchange conditions as to wealth with us down in Alabama we will cheerfully pay her proportion of the taxation toward the celebration of this anniversary, and will throw in a few millions or so beside.

I wish now, Mr. Chairman, to say something on this subject as a southern man and an Alabamian. I will leave this discussion of dollars and cents to those who have preceded and to those who are to follow me in this debate. I will merely say further in regard to this, that when a nation, no matter what intellect may guide or genius preside over it, no matter what may be its success in the attainment of riches and dominion—when it forgets its honor, when it rejects those noble sentiments which alone inspire men and communities to great deeds, no matter how prosperous it may seem to be, there is within it rottenness, and it is on the road to decline and decay and death. The lessons of history everywhere recognize the fact that it is only in the heroic ages, or under the influence of sentiments which spring from heroic ages, that nations have ever accomplished great things in the world.

But we at the South are peculiarly interested in this subject in a utilitarian point of view. Gentlemen, we do not know our own country. Any one who will mingle with the members on this floor will be struck with the fact of how little we know of each other in distant and remote sections of the United States. Members here from the Northwest and the North and from the far West, though they may have traveled through the South and are familiar with her general topographical outlines, and to some extent with her people and public men, yet know little comparatively of the South.

Let me tell you, gentlemen, what Englishmen say in regard to my own State; for they have been looking into the coal and iron resources of the South. There are in Alabama, says the London Advertiser, twenty-eight thousand million tons of coal; enough to supply the whole world for the next two thousand years. And, says a very intelligent writer, and I know to a very great extent of my own personal knowledge that his statement is true, there are iron ore and limestone in juxtaposition to it to work up all this coal in making iron. We have in Alabama a vein of iron ore which, commencing in the State of New York—being there about fifteen inches in width—is to be traced all along until you reach Tennessee, where it develops largely; then into Georgia; and in Alabama it spreads out until a man can ride a hundred miles over a bed of iron ore fifteen feet in thickness and forty feet in width, and his horse's hoof will never be off the iron ore. And we have within a few miles of it parallel lines of coal continuous and inexhaustible. We want the world and we want the people of the United States first to realize the fact that pig-iron can be made in Alabama at fifteen dollars a ton. I know this to be the truth, for I have it from iron-men who make iron there, and who inform me that in New York it brings a higher price (pig-iron I mean) than Pennsylvania iron.

We have there also a greater number of fine marbles than decorate this magnificent building. We have mountains of these. We have building stone that is not surpassed in the world. And I think if we could get you once to go to Alabama, if you could look upon our broad forests of pine as, in beautiful green, their lofty tops wave like the waters of the sea under the impulse of the gentle wind; if you could see our noble rivers, our mountains, and our valleys, which an English nobleman who traveled through Alabama since the war pronounced equal to Switzerland in their scenery; if we could have you go there and look at that land, remembering that over it all is our glorious climate, never exhausting with heat or freezing with cold, where a man can work out of doors all the year round without inconvenience, I think you would listen to our cry, you men of New England, you men of Pennsylvania, you men of the Northwest, to come to Alabama, to come with your capital and skilled labor, to enrich it and become rich yourselves—to that land where the wandering Indian tribes who had traversed more than one-half of this continent in search of a home, when they reached it and looked abroad on its beauties and loveliness, declared "Alabama"—"here let us rest." We have a State where may dwell comfortably and well, ay, prosperously and rich, ten million people, and we have only one million.

These, Mr. Chairman, are some of the reasons that influence my mind in a utilitarian point of view to favor this bill. Its purpose is a national one. I would not be willing to concede to the old Keystone State nor to the city of Brotherly Love the honor of alone commemorating this great event. All honor to the State of Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia for their generous contributions to this great object. They have proven themselves worthy of their illustrious founder and of Independence Hall.

But this work belongs to the nation, and the nation should do it. It is a nation's heritage, and a nation's obligation is upon us that we should do justice to the memory of the men of that day, to that glorious era, and to the still more glorious principles eternal in their influence upon the future of mankind, "that all men are born free and equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these, are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." These principles, sir, had never before been flung from mortal lips to the winds. Their announcement marked an era in the cycles of humanity.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am detaining the committee longer than I had intended. Sir, I sympathize with the spirit of those noble men in Independence Hall on the 4th of July, 1776, who felt that life and liberty to themselves and to the American people were involved in the issue, and feel that on this subject the action of Congress should be in consonance with and responsive to the heroism which proclaimed that "sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish, we pledge our lives, our fortunes"—not $1,000,000 or $2,000,000, not this much or that much, but all—"our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor to this cause."

Upon the moral and patriotic influences of a celebration such as is contemplated by this bill I will not enlarge; but I think, sir, that he who has studied the history of man and the history of republics, and who looks around upon our country and its condition, may well have cause to reflect whether it is not good for us that we should gather again in old Independence Hall and around the altar there, and amid its consecrated associations renew again that patriotism which glowed in the hearts of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, that love of liberty which enthused the entire people and led our revolutionary fathers to final victory and independence, and to which we can directly trace all we are, all that we have been, and all that we hope to be as a free and a great people.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great and intense interest to this debate, not because I happened to be a citizen and a Representative from Pennsylvania, but because I claim a broader and a wider nationality. I am a citizen of the United States, and feel interested in that which concerns the whole country.

Now I propose to call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to some of the features of this bill; for it is very evident that there is a misconception in the minds of members as to the nature of the bill and its provisions. I hear gentlemen talk as if this bill provided for an absolute and unconditional appropriation of $3,000,000 out of the Treasury without any safeguards and without any checks; and that when that money is obtained there would be no object to procure any more, or to use any effort for the purpose of securing money to make the centennial a success. Now this bill which I hold in my hand proposes to give $3,000,000, as follows:

Whenever it shall be certified to the Secretary of the Treasury by an officer of the United States Engineer Corps, to be detailed for the purpose as hereinafter provided, that the sum of $100,000 or more shall have been expended in the erection of buildings, preparation of the grounds, or other necessary expenditures for said celebration and exhibition, by the corporations created by the acts hereinbefore referred to.

You see, Mr. Chairman, that when the Government gives $100,000 the centennial board must provide $1,000,000, and that when the $3,000,000 shall have been drawn out of the United States Treasury the centennial board must provide $7,500,000; and they must expend that money under the supervision of an officer of the United States. I refer you also to the second section of this bill, and I ask the Clerk to read it, to show how guarded the expenditure of this money is to be.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to detail, from the Engineer Corps of the Army, a competent officer, whose duty it shall be to take an account of the expenditures for the preparation of the grounds, the erection of the buildings, and other necessary expenses for said celebration and exhibition, and at the close of each month to certify the same to the Secretary of the Treasury as hereinbefore provided. No part of the money herein appropriated shall be paid prior to the 1st day of July, 1874, and no more than $2,000,000 shall be paid during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and the remainder of said $3,000,000 shall be paid during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. So you see, Mr. Chairman, that $2,000,000 of this money is to be expended during the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June, 1875, provided the centennial board expend $5,000,000, and then the other $1,000,000 is to be expended in the year 1876 upon the condition that $2,500,000 more shall be raised and expended by the centennial board. That, sir, answers the charges which have been made here that when you have appropriated $3,000,000 you will be asked to appropriate $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 more, and that there will be no end to the appropriations that will be asked of you for this purpose. The bill further provides that not one cent of the money which is to come out of the Treasury of the United States shall be used in the payment of salaries or expenses of officials, but that the money shall go directly and immediately into the centennial buildings. Now, then, I ask whether there could be greater guards and safer checks thrown around any organization than are thrown around this centennial commission?

Gentleman say, however, that when the United States appropriates $3,000,000 they will become corporators. Not at all. The State of Pennsylvania has appropriated $1,000,000, not as stock, but as a gift. The city of Philadelphia has appropriated $1,500,000, not to be invested in the stock of this concern, but as a gift; and it assumes no responsibility beyond that. There is no constitutional lawyer upon this floor who will undertake to say that because an appropriation is made by the State of Pennsylvania or by the city of Philadelphia, or by the United States, they become liable to pay beyond the amount of the appropriation. What they do is in the shape of a gift; there the responsibility ends.

Congressional legislation upon this subject makes this exhibition a national and an international exposition. It is provided that it shall be national, because it is desirable to commemorate the greatest event in American history, the birth of a nation born to freedom and equality. If there ever was a time in human history when for the sake of example any nation should celebrate an event like this, it is in the centennial year of 1876; because the American people to-day represent the freest and best nation that was ever known, a nation which represents the idea of a free government more completely and more absolutely than ever was before realized in history.

We have heard and read of Grecian commonwealths and of other free powers of the past. But they were not based upon the intelligence of the people as our Government is; upon the just and equal recognition of the rights of all the people. The civilized world is looking to America. All men who pant for freedom, who desire to drink at this fountain of universal liberty, look to America with anxious thoughts and palpitating hearts. They expect that other nations shall be inspired by the genius which guides this great nation and this great people in the car of progress. No doubt some of the nations of Europe have drawn from this country the inspirations which have moved them on toward a higher plane of civilization.

It is fitting, as has been admitted all around, if there is to be a centennial celebration, that Philadelphia is the right place for it. Why?

Because there the Declaration of Independence was first given to the world. There is where the fathers sat in council, and deliberated until they perfected our charter of human rights. It is there that took place those deliberations which resulted in the enjoyment of what we have to-day. There stands old Independence Hall; there is old Independence Square. Pennsylvania has kept that shrine of liberty, so that all people from all nations might go there and behold it and worship there. So many sacred, so many dear memories of the past are clustered around that place, that nobody can gainsay the propriety of selecting Philadelphia as the place for this centennial celebration.

But it is more than centennial; it is proposed to make it international. Why? So that the people of other nationalities, of other climates and countries, may come when we celebrate this great epoch in history and behold us as we are at home, not as we travel abroad, not as we spend our money upon the continent of Europe, but as we are in our workshops, as we are upon our farms, as we are in the cities, in the towns, in the country, as we are upon our ships, upon our lakes, in our forests, and upon our prairies.

By this invitation we challenge competition. We are not afraid of any competition with European powers so far as relates to our ability to produce and to make that which tends to the elevation and the improvement of mankind. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GUNCKEL] addressed himself this afternoon to the constitutionality of this question. He desired to have some one point out to him where there was power given in the Constitution to make an appropriation of this kind. He is not here now; if he were here I would relieve his mind upon that point. I would refer him to the first article of the eighth section of the Constitution, to that portion of it which says that "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the nation."

Under this provision of the Constitution on three former occasions we have appropriated money to exhibit the wares and productions of American citizens at expositions in Europe—in London, in Paris, in Vienna. By virtue of this constitutional power we have organized exploring expeditions; have them going on now, those of Hayden and Raymond. By virtue of this constitutional power we purchase works of art, magnificent pictures, works of statuary, and things of that kind. It is too late to question the constitutionality of an appropriation for this purpose. Abler, wiser, better, more experienced constitutional lawyers than I profess to be, or than I think the gentleman from Ohio is, have determined and passed upon this question long ago.

It is a strange thing that gentlemen should discover the lack of constitutional power now only when it is proposed to expend some money for the purpose of making American industry appear well and to advantage at home. The Government did more than that on other occasions; it chartered vessels, and carried free of charge to Europe the objects of industry and manufacture for the expositions that were held abroad. And let me suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that by those exhibitions our commerce has increased; we have been exporting machinery all over the world, because we advertised them there and people saw their merits. Illinois is indebted largely to the exhibition of the McCormick reaper at the exhibitions in London and in Paris. Our inventive genius has blessed the world everywhere, and we have been able largely to do so because of the opportunities the foreign exhibitions afforded us to exhibit the products of our skill and inventive genius, and which the munificence of our Government enabled us to show to the people on the other side of the Atlantic.

Time fails me to enumerate here to-night how the world has been blessed in consequence of the inventions and the exhibitions which have been made at these foreign expositions by American citizens. We have expended in the aggregate, I presume, $1,000,000 to send our fabrics to Europe; and now, when we are approaching this great event in our history, we are told that we are so poor, so abjectly poverty-stricken that we cannot afford to expend a dollar for the purpose of celebrating this event!

Gentlemen say nothing has been done to commit the United States to the enterprise. Sir, I do not pretend to parry words with men who say that in the proclamations of the President, in the letter of the Secretary of State, in the laws which are upon our statute-books, we have done nothing to commit ourselves in favor of a centennial, a national or an international exhibition. Sir, if I am capable of comprehending English words when they are put into sentences, then I say that we have by executive acts and legislative enactments committed ourselves in favor of this exhibition.

Sir, we have done more than has appeared by what other gentlemen have read. I do not propose to repeat the citations of those who have preceded me, but I wish to call attention to some facts that have not been cited. I ask the Clerk to read the President's order of January 23, 1874, appointing officials from the different Departments and an official letter from the Secretary of State, which shows how far we have gone in this matter by the acts of the Executive.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it has been brought to the notice of the President of the United States that, in the international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, to be held in the city of Philadelphia, in the year 1876, for the purpose of celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the independence of the United States, it is desirable that, from the Executive Departments of the Government of the United States, in which there may be articles suitable for the purposes intended, there should appear such articles and materials as will, when presented in a collective exhibition, illustrate the functions and administrative faculties of the Government in time of peace, and its resources as a war power, and thereby serve to demonstrate the nature of our institutions and their adaptations to the wants of the people:

Now, for the purpose of securing a complete and harmonious arrangement of the articles and materials designed to be exhibited from the Executive Departments of the Government, it is ordered that a board, to be composed of one person to be named by the head of each of the Executive Departments which may have articles and materials to be exhibited, and also of one person to be named in behalf of the Smithsonian Institution, and one to be named in behalf of the Department of Agriculture, be charged with the preparation, arrangement, and safe-keeping of such articles and materials as the heads of the several Departments and the Commissioner of Agriculture and the Director of the Smithsonian Institution may respectively decide shall be embraced in the collection; that one of the persons thus named, to be designated by the President, shall be chairman of such board; and that the board appoint from their own number such other officers as they may think necessary; and that the said board, when organized, be authorized, under the direction of the President, to confer with the executive officers of the centennial exhibition in relation to such matters connected with the subject as may pertain to the respective Departments having articles and materials on exhibition; and that the names of the persons thus selected by the heads of the several Departments, the Commissioner of Agriculture, and the Director of the Smithsonian Institution shall be submitted to the President for designation.

By order of the President:

HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, January 23, 1874.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 25, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, in accordance with the order of the President of the 23d of January last, the following persons have been named by the heads of the several Departments, &c., mentioned in the order, having articles or materials to be exhibited at the centennial exhibition to be held in 1876, to compose the board directed to be created by the said order, namely:

By the Secretary of the Treasury—Hon. F. A. Sawyer.
By the Secretary of War—Colonel S. C. Lyford, United States Army.
By the Secretary of the Navy—Admiral T. A. Jenkins, United States Navy.
By the Secretary of the Interior—John Eaton, esq.
By the Postmaster-General—Dr. Charles F. McDonald.
By the Department of Agriculture—William Saunders, esq.
By the Smithsonian Institution—Professor S. F. Baird.

I have the honor further to inform you that the President has designated Colonel S. C. Lyford, United States Army, to be the chairman of such board.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH.

Hon. WILLIAM W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Now, it has been alleged that no States have taken part in this matter. I find, sir, that the State of Tennessee took action and requested her representatives to vote in favor of a bill such as this. The same remark applies to the State of North Carolina, the State of Virginia, and the State of Kentucky. All have taken direct action upon the subject, besides the State of New Jersey and some other States which, I understand, have been considering the question.

On the 7th of May, 1873, there was held in Philadelphia a meeting of the United States centennial commission, the proceedings of which I hold in my hand. I find that thirty-eight States and Territories were represented there and took action on this subject. Some few States were not represented. Maine, for instance, was not represented formally, but she was represented informally, and she spoke through one of her Representatives. An honored son of Pennsylvania, who has been adopted by the State of Maine, and who has warm and throbbing impulses for this enterprise—the man who has been thrice honored with the Speakership of this House—spoke on that occasion. I ask the Clerk to read the remarks of Hon. Mr. BLAINE, who gave his opinion as to what this Congress ought to do.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hon. JAMES G. BLAINE, Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, was introduced to the commission, and spoke as follows:

Mr. President and gentlemen: I must confess I am taken a little by surprise. I was about taking a seat in what we at Washington call the "lobby." An enterprise of this kind, however, is one which I am sure will require no "lobbying" at Washington. I have never doubted that the Congress of the United States, which had contributed $400,000 to the French exposition, would at the proper time contribute millions to our own exposition. I have no right to say that such a thing will be done, but I have no doubt that Congress will in this matter display a most liberal and comprehensive spirit. While I have no right to promise anything beyond my own vote, I feel that Congress will, at the proper time, give all the aid necessary, so as to make our exhibition transcend those of England, France, and Austria. In my own State of Maine a very lively interest is manifested, and I am sure that at the proper time a liberal appropriation will be made, as will be the case with all the other States. I have nothing further to say, other than, by my presence, I desire to express the great interest I have in the centennial exhibition.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, this bill is objected to for the reason that it makes an appropriation of money and because it is said to be in conflict with former legislation. I have heard gentlemen speak of the pending measure as being perfidious, as being full of bad faith; as if there never had been any such thing as repealing old laws or changing those that may have been bad for better. Why, Mr. Chairman, is it perfidious because the people come here and ask this Congress to make an appropriation for the purpose of celebrating the anniversary of American independence? Is it possible that when men come and ask a comparatively small appropriation for such a purpose as this, they are to be told that it is an act of perfidy and that they are "raiders upon the Treasury?" Why, sir, Pennsylvania is arraigned here. The gentleman from Maine speaks of Pennsylvania and of those who interest themselves in this matter as being in the lobbies, in the corridors, and everywhere else about this Capitol, besieging men. Sir, where is the man who has been besieged improperly on this subject? Has the gentleman from Maine? Has the gentleman from Kansas? Are they suspicious characters, whom the lobby would take hold of under the belief that they would do things improperly? See how Pennsylvania is arraigned here:

To-day she storms the doors of Congress, and forgetful of pledges that to an ordinary man involve in the highest degree human character, she clamors for $3,000,000, forgetting and treading into the dust her promises.

Is Pennsylvania here lobbying? Who are the men that are doing it? I happen to reside in the same town with one of the commissioners from Pennsylvania, Hon. Asa Packer. I defy anybody to name the time when that gentleman was here asking anybody to do anything in regard to this centennial.

One word in regard to the invitations. It has been said that invitations which have been sent out have not been accepted, and that the acceptances which have been received are by inferior powers. Let me suggest to gentlemen that one of the powers that has accepted the invitation is the Netherlands; and those who have read the history of the Netherlands as written by Motley and the biography of John of Barneveldt, know that the people of the Netherlands were the pioneers of civil liberty in the world; that during the reign of Queen Elizabeth the greatest battle for human rights that was ever fought was fought by the Netherlands, and they won through Prince William and Barneveldt against all odds and combinations.

We should welcome them upon our shores when we celebrate this great day.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit to the House some remarks made on this subject of the centennial by others.

The Clerk read as follows:

Extract from report of Hon. Charles Francis Adams, jr., of Massachusetts, as commissioner from that State to the Vienna exhibition:

"There is good reason to believe that every condition exists necessary to make a decided success of the proposed Philadelphia centennial. The court pageant, which has played so brilliant and essential a part in its great European prototypes, will, it is true, necessarily be wanting. The mercantile element, however, which has proved the great mainspring of all recent expositions, will there be present in a more than ordinary degree. Throughout the civilized world America is known as a great market; as a market in which fabulous prices are paid, especially for those things which are rich or rare. Accordingly, all the greatest producers of the world, whether of objects of utility or of art, will wish to be represented. They will come with every conceivable product of human skill, and more especially with those a familiarity with which is in itself a liberal education, and the production of which offers well-nigh unlimited fields for American development."

Professor W. P. Blake, of Connecticut, said:

"The feeling abroad on the Continent toward the exhibition is particularly favorable. At Vienna there was ample evidence that foreigners would heartily join in it. Constant reference was made to it in the daily journals; and in the social meetings of the international jury, a body of men some six hundred in number, of all nations, pledges of reunion in 1876 'in America' were many and hearty. The scientific men and specialists look forward to the exhibition as likely to afford them a coveted opportunity to see the New World, and the manufacturers and merchants regard the exhibition as their opportunity to extend their trade in one of their best markets. Thousands will avail of the exceptionally low rates of fare and the increased facilities to visit the country, not for the exhibition only, but to journey to Niagara, Salt Lake, Yosemite, &c.

"It is not a mere Fourth of July affair, but a celebration of the centenary. It will not interfere with the speeches or bonfires for those who like them best. It proposes to be something more and better than a day's uproar. But it is a narrow view that would limit the exhibition to purely American productions and art, even if this were possible. Many of our arts, as we well know, are dependent for their existence upon foreign productions. To be just to ourselves, to principle, and to others, the exhibition should be international and comparative. If it is in any sense to commemorate or show the progress of the country during the century, it must be such. How otherwise are we to measure our progress? Are we not willing to place our productions alongside of foreign products? And are we unwilling to recognize progress made beyond our boundaries?"

Hon. Alexander G. Cattell, of New Jersey, used the following language:

"Let me impress upon you the fact that hundreds and hundreds on the other side of the water have said to me, 'This celebration of yours is not only in good taste, but it is just what is wanted to make the world acquainted with your resources, your institutions, and the character of your people.'"

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I will say this is a matter which we of Pennsylvania are not so wedded to as people might suppose, listening to speeches made here. We desire to celebrate the centennial because it is appropriate. We have shown we desire it by what we have done. Pennsylvania stands pledged to give $4,500,000 at this time toward this enterprise. You make this appropriation and there will be millions subscribed in Pennsylvania, because the people will know there is earnestness in this matter. The people of Pennsylvania who border on Ohio, New York, Delaware, New Jersey, and Maryland are taxed for this purpose, and cheerfully submit, because they believe that the proper celebration of the centennial will do more to unite the people of the States than any other thing you can devise. It will stimulate a generous national sentiment which will do much to perpetuate our free institutions. Refuse to give this appropriation and the people will believe that we are bankrupt, and Europe will certainly doubt our ability to resume specie payments.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I have gladly yielded to others my opportunity to speak earlier in this debate, because I was anxious other States should be heard before Pennsylvania spoke by her Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, the debate of an American Congress upon a subject of national or historical importance attracts the attention of the civilized world; the more so should the topic discussed directly interest the people of other countries. I have for several weeks anticipated aright the range of debate upon the passage of this bill, and I exceedingly regret that I find in it much, even when the bill becomes a law, that might make the sensitive, intelligent, and refined hesitate whether to accept the invitation, whether to bring to our international exposition the products of art, science, and manufactures to compete with such as may be furnished by our own citizens. These expositions being in the nature of business exhibitions of commodities, of course relieve to a great extent the apparent coldness of the invitation, and we shall doubtless have throngs of exhibitors and almost countless articles of foreign growth and manufacture brought to our country. But if Congress had acted promptly and shown a readiness to make our centennial a success, the world would have seen in 1876 such a display as had never been witnessed before at the oldest capital on similar occasions.

Centuries measure the growth and progress of nations. Events of great personal importance are marked by the same space of time. On the 22d of February, 1832, the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington was celebrated all over our land. At that time the country had just commenced its great career of progress. We were then entering upon systems of internal improvement, thought sufficient for the purposes of that distant day, which have given place long since to speedier means of communication. American industry was beginning to feel its manhood, and when the year 1876 comes, at the end of more than one generation of men, our land now traversed by endless miles of railroads, our cities, towns, and valleys alive with every variety of manufacturing, makes an American justly proud and anxious to bring the people of the Old World to our shores, to see the rapidity of human progress and civilization and advancement under a republican form of government.

The birth of Shakespeare has been commemorated by centennial celebrations wherever the English language is understood. The Carpenters' Company, of Philadelphia, in whose venerated building the Continental Congress first met, celebrates the one hundredth anniversary of that event September 5th of this year. Their patriotic resolutions inviting this Congress to assemble there on that occasion were presented some weeks ago by me. The descendants of the noble men who founded this society will be honored by your acceptance. The Methodist Episcopal Church a few years ago celebrated their centenary, and in every city, town, village, and hamlet, in valley and on hill-top, the praying millions of that Christian denomination gave thanks to God that the one hundredth year of their organization had come; and, while renewing their faith in His divine protection, offered up $5,000,000 to the cause Christ.

Suppose they could have met in one consecrated spot as the nation can in Philadelphia; how grand and sublime that Christian concourse would have been! Another event in the religious world was celebrated a year or two ago when the two branches of the Presbyterian Church, the old and new schools, came together in a permanent reunion after a separation of many years. I give this as an illustration of the result of the joyful joining of hands by these Christian people, who met just as the men of the North and the South will meet in 1876. These good Presbyterians not only crowded their churches and held devotional exercises, but as a bond of their renewed association signalized the event by subscribing throughout their whole denomination millions for the advancement of religion. If under one broad canopy or under the blue vault of heaven, on some sacred ground, such a single gathering could have been held as we now will hold in the city of the nation's birth, how memory would enjoy the scene for a lifetime!

This invitation is to be made at the end of the first century of our national existence. Under the shadow of Independence Hall, the world is asked to come, and if the genius of our institutions does not appear to such advantage as to dim the luster of the long ages of existence of other governments, then American skill, heroic energy, intelligent education, and the stimulant of freedom have been cherished for a century in vain. The 4th of July, 1776, with a population of three millions, the 4th of July, 1876, increased to forty-three millions. The city of Philadelphia, (and I name it not in any invidious comparison with other American cities, but because the great event is to be celebrated there,) at the time of the Declaration of Independence the largest city in North America, containing about five thousand buildings, to-day contains over one hundred and thirty thousand, adding for many years past annually as many as were inhabited at the time of the revolutionary struggle. So in the same ratio I presume the increase and growth of cities in every State.

Mr. Chairman, the citizens of Philadelphia do not disguise the fact that they have a pride in the success of the centennial. They rejoice that the act of March 3, 1871, designated it as the proper locality for the celebration, and the country to-day expects us to so act as to make the international exposition a success. Now more than three years after the passage of that law Congress is asked "to appropriate $3,000,000 in aid of the centennial celebration and international exhibition." The acts of the Forty-first Congress have become a part of the archives of our Government. They were passed by as patriotic, high-toned, and honorable gentlemen as to-day assemble in this Hall. Words spoken, opinions expressed, and votes given by the Representatives in that Congress were as well and as gravely considered as in this. The record stands and will stand forever, and the apparent inconsistency endeavored to be made an argument against the appropriation here proposed is at the most but an individual opinion, expressed, as

I believe, in all sincerity and with no desire to deceive. Those who were here then, who are now no longer members, were esteemed the same high-minded, patriotic men as their successors, and never intentionally betrayed their trust by word or deed.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot see how any gentleman can construe the provisions of any of the acts in reference to the centennial in any other way than as establishing an international exposition. Not a section scarcely of either of the principal acts but speaks of an exhibition where the world may exhibit; not a line, in my opinion, but tenders through the President of the United States an invitation to the people of foreign countries, soliciting their contributions in competition with those made by our own citizens. The acts themselves gave the invitations, and whatever construction may have been put upon them by any officials, they nevertheless were the invitations of the American people through their representatives in Congress to the people of every country where America is known and where diplomatic communication exists. You cannot take back these invitations. Wherever they have gone the courtesy of the Republic is involved, and the patriotism of the American representative abroad would be sorely tried should this Congress make it incumbent upon him to withdraw them.

What matters it whether the nation invited is great or small in population or territory? What matters it whether a long succession of kings or emperors sits upon a throne or that popular will has selected a ruler over a small and less demonstrative nationality? The inventive genius, the devotee of science, the searcher for information are not found in any special part of the earth's surface. The contribution from the most diminutive country of Europe or Asia may bear away the premium from the citizen of the greatest of the world's kingdoms. It is the man at last, and whether he dwells in the remotest corner of the earth a world's exhibition will fairly judge his skill, and in the international exposition of 1876 he will be made welcome to all the honors his achievement in art or science demands.

Mr. Chairman, I do not consider $3,000,000 a small sum of money. In the abstract it is a very large amount, but in comparison with the great results to come from the centennial it diminishes greatly. That amount is asked for by the commissioners. They have never intruded upon Congress. They have never harassed or importuned the members. They have been dignified, wise, and sincere of purpose, but in their associations with Representatives they have stated their case, and in no way endeavored to influence their judgment excepting by manly, patriotic argument; esteemed citizens, whose sole interest in the success of this international exposition is to sustain the honor of the country and to bring us in contact and fair competition with all who have already accepted and will still accept our invitation. I say by comparison with results $3,000,000 is not a large amount. Its expenditure by the Government will be in the interest of peace. It is not to be expended at one time, but through a period of two years; thus the amount, or a large portion of it, will remain in the Treasury to be paid out upon the report of a Government officer pari passu as money otherwise contributed is expended and as the buildings progress toward completion.

No one, Mr. Chairman, can deny that we have a burden of debt upon us, nor can any one desire to see its increase. Judging from the statement of the public debt for the month of April, we are decreasing the increase for the past few months; and in the coming months of the fiscal year the decrease will continue. Do gentlemen forget that during the four years of the war we expended $3,000,000 a day, or at that rate? Can we not now safely appropriate $3,000,000, to be used within the next two years, without making the Government bankrupt? I cannot believe the American people desire us to take one step backward in this the grandest of the peaceful projects of the country. As the time draws nearer for the opening of the exposition the enthusiasm will be intense, and I look upon the 4th day of July, 1876, in the city of Philadelphia, as the greatest national day ever known in the history of the world. Hundreds of thousands of people will crowd its streets, welcomed by its citizens. Gladness will reign, and let come who will, from abroad or from our own country, from any part of the earth, the citizens of that patriotic city will give a reception never to be forgotten. Our houses, our homes, will be open literally to all the world in ceaseless hospitality.

Why, Mr. Chairman, this $3,000,000, divided up between States and congressional districts, would be but a small amount, and so diminutive in pennies in the way of taxation over a period of about twenty-four months, to be levied upon the goods, chattels, and effects of each man, woman, and child in the country, that I will not calculate it. De minimis non curatur.

Mr. Chairman, much has been said about the apparent smallness of individual subscriptions in the different States. I am not at all surprised at that. The people—and they are intelligent and calculate cost and are economical—feel that the Government should contribute to this great international centennial exposition. They have a right to ask Congress to make this appropriation, and have a right to expect Congress to authorize it. I believe throughout the country the desire to see such a celebration is almost universal, and a year hence, should disaster come to this bill, they who bring it about will regret that they have placed an obstacle in the way of the success of the centennial jubilation of the birth of the Republic. Failure will bring chagrin and mortification upon the people, and rest assured their Representatives will feel the disappointment of their constituents much more than the enjoyment they now anticipate from defeating the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I must confess my heart is in this measure. I have had the success of this bill on my mind since the commencement of the session. As a Philadelphian, I cannot relieve myself of a local feeling. As a Pennsylvanian, my State pride encourages my hope of its success, and I am sure neither State nor city has stood back or failed in material aid. The city which I have the honor in part to represent never fails in its duty to its country or other communities. While cheerfully subscribing as it ought, and feeling honored in having the opportunity to do largely for this exposition, its citizens willingly find time to regard the sufferings of the southwestern portion of the country and mingle with their sympathy means to aid the distress. My colleagues and I will join hands with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] in voting more substantial help for the sufferers by the inundation should we be called upon.

Will this committee hesitate to act favorably on the bill? The same patriotic sentiment exists all through the land as exists in Pennsylvania. Even the State of Maine, one district of which is represented by my friend, [Mr. HALE,] all its members on this floor, save him, favor this appropriation, and I believe both the Senators. It is here we must judge of the feelings of the people on any given subject. It is not confined within State lines, and common country expects us to give liberally to the international exposition to be held in Fairmount Park, in Philadelphia, between the 19th days of April and October, 1876.

Mr. LOFLAND. Mr. Chairman, I concur entirely in the views of my eloquent friend from Pennsylvania, [Judge KELLEY,] so ably and forcibly advanced yesterday in his advocacy of this measure. I think it proper and becoming that the centennial of the nation should be observed in accordance with our power and greatness. No nation in the world's history ever progressed in the arts and sciences, population and power, as this. But a few years since, sir, and where you now sit and where this imposing structure stands, bearing the beautiful figure of Liberty aloft to the clouds, the rank thistle nodded to the breeze and the wild fox digged his hole unscared. The deep stillness of the primeval forest was broken by naught but the shrill scream of the panther, or the defiant yell of the still fiercer savage as he grappled in the death struggle with his enemy.

From a handful of devoted hearts who sought these shores for conscience sake we number to-day forty millions of freemen, with a land dotted with towns and cities, and capable of supporting and feeding the whole world. The nations gaze upon us with wonder, and our power and greatness are respected and acknowledged throughout the civilized world. No Aladdin's lamp or Arabian Nights ever presented a spectacle so grand or a history so wonderful as the growth of these United States. Though the nation is as yet in its infancy—not older than many of its citizens—it stands acknowledged among the foremost peoples of the earth in all that makes a nation great. The inventive genius of our citizens is second to none, and our energy and pluck are equal to our genius. Nothing has or can check our onward march. Though engaged in a gigantic war, such as the world never witnessed before, we girdled the continent with an iron band, and wedded the oceans on either shore. From a struggle which would have annihilated older nations, we emerged greater, stronger, more reliant than ever. He who lives to see the hundredth birthday of the nation will see a people greater and stronger still, only needing union and harmony and brotherhood to make us the arbiters of the world.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what can have a greater tendency to bring about so desirable a result than that our people should come together from every section of the country? Let the East and West, the North and South, mingle together, ignoring and forgetting the differences and strife which so lately distracted and divided us, and join in one common jubilee in commemoration of the achievements and glories of our common ancestry. And what more appropriate place than beneath the shadow of the old State-house, and within the sound of that historic bell which "proclaimed liberty throughout the land, and to all the inhabitants thereof"—there, where our fathers pledged their lives and honors for the maintenance of the great principles which to-day are acknowledged without dissent in every part of this broad land? What could be more grateful than to see a united people contending together to honor the memory of those grand spirits who founded a nation and bequeathed freedom to their children? There, upon the hundredth anniversary of the nation's existence, the children of this great Republic may emulate each other in the arts of peace, exhibiting for each other's information the improvements and inventions of the several sections, their pursuits and resources, and the various and diverse information, which tends to interest and unite a people, and which can only be learned by contact and intercourse.

By this, the wants and needs, and capacities of the various sections can be ascertained and understood, and the whole people, sinking all differences and jealousies, forget that they are from the East or the West, the North or the South, and remember and feel only that they are Americans; a title "honorable" and respected as that ever boasted by the Roman of old, when his city was mistress of the world. To achieve a result like this, should money be a consideration? What is the paltry sum of three or five million dollars, or even more, when weighed in the balance with the good results to be derived from a nation united in commemoration of a common inheritance? I contend, Mr.

Chairman, if the centennial celebration of the nation's birth was to have no international feature connected with it, that even then it would be right and proper that Congress should see that the occasion was observed in accordance with the dignity and grandeur of the nation.

I hold that Bunker Hill does not belong solely to Massachusetts, nor Princeton and Monmouth and Valley Forge and Brandywine to the States within whose borders they are, but their glories and memories belong equally to the Old Thirteen and the newer States carved out of the patrimony acquired by the struggle of which they are the glorious mementoes. Washington and his compatriots belonged to the nation, and it is becoming that their achievements should be commemorated—not by Pennsylvania or Virginia or New York alone, but by the whole nation, having one history, one coutnry, one destiny.

But, Mr. Chairman, I see great propriety in making the celebration international as well as national. We have extended trade and intercourse with all the nations of the earth. The comparison of industries and inventions, the peculiar products and necessities of different peoples, would be more marked and instructive when brought into juxtaposition with each other, and would offer a larger field for our people to display their skill and energy in inventing and supplying other peoples with whatever they need for their comfort or convenience. A jealous rivalry would spring up among the nations, not of arms or of martial glory, but a generous and laudable competition as to who should excel in the arts of peace, in developing whatever is required for the benefit and advancement of the human race.

No doubt our old friend and ally would take especial pleasure in witnessing the progress of a people she once helped, when help was needed, and the countrymen of La Fayette would gladly exhibit to the countrymen of Washington the products and manufactures of which they may well be proud; and Germany no doubt will contribute her part in the great exhibition, for so many of her citizens have emigrated from the Vaterland to build up homes in this great country that they form a large element of our population, and there must of necessity be a kindly feeling between the two nations. It has been said by some that it would be rather ungracious to invite Great Britain to participate in our anniversary, but I am not of those who think that a great and brave and enlightened people, such as the English people are, can entertain animosity for events so long past. We speak the same language, and are bound together by trade and intercourse, which neither can forego, and it is to the interest of both that that trade and intercourse should be increased. Besides, I am sure that the English people at heart are proud of us as a people and would be glad of an opportunity to compare her skill and ingenuity with that of ours and other nations of the world.

I do not feel bound, Mr. Chairman, by what are claimed to be promises in the inception of this undertaking. If when this matter was first mooted gentlemen supposed the object could be accomplished without cost to the General Government, and it has since been ascertained they were mistaken, I see no reason why this should be held up to the present Congress as an argument against making an appropriation for the purpose. Indeed I would object to any one State appropriating to itself the management and glory of the whole affair. As a Representative of one of the original Old Thirteen, I feel that my people have an interest in this patriotic movement as well as the great State of Pennsylvania, and I am willing that the younger States, those that have come into existence since the great event we propose to commemorate, shall have an equal share in the joy and glory of the occasion. I want to see Bunker Hill and Yorktown alike represented, and the children of Adams and Jefferson alike renew their fealty to the great principles of their fathers; and where so fitting a place as that in which those great principles were first enunciated to the world?

I think there are other things in this world quite as valuable as money; and I believe that no more judicious investment can be made by the nation, if it has the effect of uniting us more thoroughly. I hope and believe that the proposed celebration would be the commencement of a new era in our country's history—an era of good feeling, when the sections would forget their differences, and vie only with each other in endeavors to build up and strengthen our common country, making it one and indissoluble, and placing it on a foundation so firm as to last for all time. In achieving such a result the cost ought not to be considered.

Mr. MELLISH. If I were controlled in my vote entirely by the apparent direct interest of the city of New York, perhaps I should support the bill now under consideration; for doubtless New York will reap a large harvest through the attractions of a great international exhibition in a neighboring and relatively an inland city, which shall draw to our shores many people from many lands, generally with full purses, and possessed of a liberal disposition to lighten them. A large proportion of visitors to the centennial, not from foreign nations only but also from our own, will pass through and probably sojourn for some time in the metropolis of this continent. Its unexampled attractions will induce them to spend a good deal of time there, and as a natural sequence a good deal of money. For though Philadelphia will have her centennial—and the best wishes and co-operation of the city of New York will attend her in this patriotic and noble undertaking to provide a great industrial university where earth's invention will be stored, and where in peace once more the nations will meet—

> And science, art, and labor will outpour
> Their myriad horns of plenty at our feet—

New York will continue to be, as she always has been, the central point of attraction of this continent—the conceded paradise of accomplished travelers, persons of culture and elegant leisure, to say nothing of the flight hitherward of numberless restless persons who are always on the wing and pleasure-seekers in general. And all, of course, to the benefit, if not the glory, of my own dear city of New York.

But looking at the question through the impartial and unprejudiced vision of the general welfare of the country, and especially in its relations to a depleted Treasury, I am constrained to withhold my support to the appropriation.

It is believed that Mr. Sumner's zeal in opposition to the bill to appropriate $3,000,000 out of the public Treasury in aid of the centennial celebration overtasked his powers to such a degree as to have proved the immediate cause of his death. He brought all his wonderful industry and grasp of mind to the examination of the subject, and not long before his death remarked with much satisfaction and self-gratulation, and implied congratulation to the country, that he felt assured that his efforts had saved the nation $20,000,000.

The incongruity, the anomaly, of the crowned heads meeting with us vis-à-vis by their representatives in the celebration of an event which is peculiarly and solely American—being indeed a protest against the European theory of the divine right of kings, and their claim that the mass of mankind was created for the benefit of a few individuals, upon which their systems are built—might perhaps prove a theme too curious to here consider. At any rate I have not the time, nor do I know that I am at all called upon to enter upon such discussion. The dish of "spread eagle" has appeared prominently on the bill of fare; indeed we have had it so much and so often and so long, that it would not be strange if it began to pall upon the appetite. I am not ambitious to come into competition with the accomplished caterers of this favorite American dish.

In conclusion, from what attention I have been able to bestow on the question before the House, I have found it impossible to reach the conviction that I should be justified in voting for an appropriation of $3,000,000 at this time for the purpose proposed.

But when the great centennial, the Fourth of July, 1876, comes, to quote Emerson's wild-wood notes, as applicable to the day—

> When tenderly the haughty day
> Fills his blue urn with fire;
> One morn within the mighty heaven,
> And one in our desire.
>
> The cannon booms from town to town,
> Our pulses are not less;
> The joy-bells ring their gladness down,
> Which children's voices bless.
>
> The men are ripe of Saxon kind
> To build an equal State,
> To take the statute from the mind,
> And make of duty fate.
>
> And henceforth there shall be no chain,
> Save underneath the sea
> The wires shall murmur through the main
> Sweet songs of liberty.
>
> For He that buildeth high and wise,
> Nor pauseth in his plan,
> Will take the sun out of the sky,
> Ere freedom out of man.
>
> * * *
> God said, I am tired of kings,
> I suffer them no more;
> Up to my ear the morning brings
> The outrage of the poor.
>
> Think ye I made this ball
> A field of havoc and war,
> Where tyrants great and tyrants small
> Might harry the weak and poor?
>
> My angel, his name is Freedom,
> Choose him to be your king;
> He shall cut pathways east and west,
> And fend you with his wing.
>
> Lo! I uncover the land
> Which I hid of old time in the West,
> As the sculptor uncovers the statue
> When he has wrought his best;
>
> I show Columbia, of the rocks
> Which dip their foot in the seas,
> And soar to the air-borne flocks
> Of clouds, and the boreal fleece.
>
> I will divide my goods;
> Call in the wretch and the slave:
> None shall rule but the humble,
> And none but toil shall have.
>
> I will have never a noble,
> No lineage counted great;
> Fishers and choppers and plowmen
> Shall constitute a state.

And allow me to quote the Poet Laureate Tennyson's felicitous lines as applicable to the occasion:

And lo! the long laborious miles
Of palaces; lo! the giant aisles,
Rich in model and design;
Harvest-tool and husbandry,
Loom and wheel and engin'ry,
Secrets of the sullen mine,
Steel and gold, and corn and wine,
Fabric rough, or Fairy fine,
Sunny tokens of the Line,
Polar marvels, and a feast
Of wonder out of West and East,
And shapes and hues of art divine!
All of beauty, all of use,
That one fair planet can produce.
Brought from under every star,
Blown from over every main,
And mix't, as life is mixed with pain,
The works of peace with works of war.

Oh let the fair white-winged peacemaker fly
To happy heavens under all the sky,
And mix the seasons and the golden hours,
Till each man finds his own in all men's good,
And all men work in noble brotherhood,
Breaking their mailed fleets and armed towers,
And ruling by obeying nature's powers,
And gathering all the fruits of peace and crown'd with all her flowers.

Turn we now to consider the epochs of our Government, the rallying cries of these several periods, and their significance.

There has been in this country the era of Liberty with its War of the Revolution and watchword of "Independence;" the era of Nationality, with its adoption of the Constitution, and watchword of "Equal Taxation;" the era of Freedom on the Seas, with the watchword of "Sailors' Rights;" the era of Recovered Nationality, with its watchword of "Emancipation." Liberty and equality are the words which may be called the exponents of the leading ideas of our system of republican government. Paraphrasing one of De Quincey's famous prose poems, let us in trance pass over land and sea, and imagine ourselves with Lincoln, among companions crowned with laurel. The darkness of gathering midnight, brooding over all the land, hide from us the mighty crowds that are weaving restlessly about us as a center. We hear them but we see them not. Tidings went out at midnight of a grandeur that measured itself against centuries; too full of pathos they were, too full of joy that acknowledged no fountain but God, to utter themselves by other language than by tears, by restless anthems, and by reverberations rising from every loyal heart throughout the land. These tidings we that sat upon the laureled car had it for our privilege to publish among all nations. And already, by signs audible through the darkness, by snortings and tramplings, our angry horses, that know no fear of fleshly weariness, upbraided us with delay. Wherefore was it that we delayed? We waited for a secret word that should bear witness to the hope of nations, as now accomplished forever. At midnight the secret word went forth; which word was Emancipation! The dreadful word, as it passed along the multitudinous wires that diverged from the Capitol in every direction, shone by its own light; before us it went; high above our Army leaders' heads it rode, and spread a golden light over the paths which we traversed. Every city, at the presence of the secret word, threw open its gates to receive it. The rivers were silent as it crossed. All the infinite forests, as it ran along their margins, shivered in homage to the secret word. And the darkness comprehended it. And everywhere, to the right hand and left of our course, loyal hearts, that had been dying or sickening, kindled anew in sympathy with the secret word that was flying past.

And in lowly hamlets in southern sunny climes were heard voices from dusky-faced men, women, and children that sang of deliverance; that wept no more tears, as once their fathers had wept, but only tears of joy; but at intervals that sang to the generations, saying—

Chant the deliverer's praise in every tongue;

And receiving answer—

Such as once in heaven and earth were sung.

And of their chanting was no end, nor shall be forevermore.

As the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] this afternoon reserved the privilege of replying to my question, I beg another moment to state what want of time prevented my presenting in my interrogatory. I would not introduce such a comparison in regard to another, but I hope I may be permitted in regard to myself to say that I am in the rather uncomfortable situation of the fabled snake with two heads, and find myself now advancing and again retrograding. In short, my sympathies and heart are with the centennial, but my intellectual intuitions and my head are against a depletion of the Treasury to the amount of $3,000,000 for the purpose proposed by this bill. I wish to disclaim any jealousy or rivalry on the part of New York City as against the city known and named universally the "City of Brotherly Love." I have no doubt New York will be greatly benefited by the centennial. I have no doubt she will contribute liberally of her sympathy and her means to advance this grandly sublime, patriotic, and eminently praiseworthy conception, which, when realized in fact, will be a great factor among the opportunities for human enjoyment, will tend to the diffusion of useful knowledge, to the promotion of the useful arts and sciences, and in many ways will dispense widespread benefits, which it is easy to imagine, especially in their peaceful and elevating influences, will be in the interest of the people of all climes and countries in these and future times. And I sincerely believe that thousands of voices all over our broad land will be lifted up in favor of this great undertaking, and the contributions of money from private sources will be greater in the aggregate if the Government does not accede to the clamor of sturdy beggars who, like the daughter of the horse-leech, I am afraid may come again and again and cry "Give, give!" and then, like Oliver Twist, will return crying "More, more!"

I do not fear for the success of the exhibition. If no subsidy be given by the Government, and the enterprise is thrown entirely on the voluntary support of the people, they will respond with a liberality that will astonish and confound all prognostications of the croakers and weak-kneed and weak-backed supplicants for money from the Treasury. God and the people help those who help themselves. Let us go forward with full faith and courage on behalf of this excelsior enterprise.

Let us go forward under the inspiration and guidance of those springs of successful action—

Self-reverence, self-knowledge, self-control—and we shall have an exhibition worthy the occasion which is to commemorate one of the grand events of the ages whose beacon-light through all time will tower over the wrecks of false systems of kingdoms and dynasties, dispensing everlasting blessings of light and hope to all generations in their onward and upward progress.

Mr. HAZELTON, of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to detain the committee at this late hour of the night for the purpose of giving notice to this committee and the world that I am a candidate for a seat in the other end of the Capitol. Neither do I rise to criticise my own apparel or the apparel of any other member in this House. Nor do I claim the attention of the committee for the purpose of airing witicisms borrowed from Dickens. I merely wish to put myself right upon the record, and to say that I am in full accord with those who support the bill now before us. I am in favor of the proposed centennial celebration. I shall support with voice and vote the bill under consideration. In that regard I am in perfect harmony with the Legislature of my own State and with my own immediate constituents.

It is known to this House that during the last session of the Legislature of New Jersey a resolution was adopted recommending the holding of the centennial celebration in Philadelphia in 1876, and also requesting the members of Congress from that State to vote for a reasonable sum in order to carry out the object of the resolution, and to carry out the object of the centennial exposition. Every member representing my district in the Legislature of my State voted in favor of those resolutions. They not only said we should vote for a reasonable amount to carry out this object, but they also enacted a law subscribing for $100,000 of centennial stock. I know this is not very much, but it shows that the people of New Jersey are in full accord with this great undertaking. So far as the people of my own district are concerned, I feel that nine-tenths of them will support me in voting for the bill now before us. I know in that district we have not very large cities, but I think as a mass there is as much comfort, there is as much intelligence, there is as much solid wealth in that district as in almost any other district represented upon this floor. I have not the slightest doubt but they will be willing to bear their full share of the tax imposed upon the people to carry out this noble object.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] who has addressed the committee this afternoon does not feel inclined to obey the request of the Legislature of his State. He tells us if he were in the other end of the Capitol he would be willing to obey it. He tells us further that the people in his district are not in favor of this centennial exposition. He points to the poor people of Paterson, and he parades their poverty before the House and the country. He continually talks about the poor people of Paterson. I do not believe the people in Paterson, or in his district outside of that city, will thank him for parading before the House and the country that they are beggars, and that they are in the habit of sending to him for five dollars. He makes that declaration on the floor of the House, that they do send to him for that small sum of money.

Mr. Chairman, if there should be a man in my district who was in distress and I should consider it my duty to give him five dollars, I feel my constituents would spurn me if here on this floor and before the whole country I should proclaim that I had done that simple act of charity.

Mr. Chairman, it is a singular fact that gentlemen who have been born with silver spoons in their mouths are always parading their sympathies for the working people. I think that I am in sympathy with the working people of this country. Every gentleman who knows me knows that from my earliest youth I have been a workingman, and I think I know and feel as much for the workingmen of this country as any man upon this floor; and I believe heartily and earnestly that the great mass of the working people of this country are in favor of this great centennial celebration.

The question was asked yesterday, where will the money come from? Now, I think if the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, who seems to be so fearful that the country will be bankrupt and is bankrupt already, will report a tariff bill whereby barriers can be built up between American-paid labor and the pauper labor of Europe, we will no longer be bankrupt, but the people of Paterson and every manufacturing town all over the country will have plenty to do, and we will again be a prosperous, thriving people.

We were told yesterday, Mr. Chairman, by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] that the nations of the Old World will not come and unite with us in this celebration. England, he says, remembers that the Colonies from which we spring were the brightest jewels in her crown. Look, sir, at the intercourse between this country and England. Look at the lines of steamships plying between our Atlantic sea-ports and Liverpool. Does this show that the English people are not willing to come and unite with us? Does it not show that where there is a chance to make money, there they will go?

And look at France and Germany and other European powers. The lines of steamships plying backward and forward between those countries and ours show that they too will come and unite with us in this great centennial celebration. The gentleman told us that they would not come because our institutions were not in accord with theirs. They do come now. Let us do our part in this matter and they will come over and help us.

As regards the benefits that will result from this centennial celebration I will not dwell upon them. They have already been made known to the House and the country by various gentlemen, especially by the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania who spoke yesterday, [Mr. KELLEY,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] at my left who spoke to-night. And I may say, as my friend [Mr. ALBRIGHT] has just remarked to me, Paterson is a manufacturing city. Certainly she is; and she will exhibit her wares to good purpose.

Again, Mr. Chairman, they tell us that all similar exhibitions have failed; that in England, in France, and in Austria they have all failed financially. Why has this been the case? Simply because in England, in France, and in Austria the millions of the people, the toiling millions, are comparatively poor. The head of a family who only earns a shilling a day, and boards himself at that, cannot be expected to have any money to pay for the purpose of visiting any kind of exhibition, whether national or international. This is the case all over these countries. The poor, the toiling masses there, have not the money to enable them to attend or to give away for the purpose of supporting such exhibitions. Is that the case in this country? Thank God, no. Although we have been told here over and over again that we are bankrupt, yet in this country the people have money and they are in the habit of visiting the different sections of the country. Let us inaugurate the centennial, and from all over the country the workingmen, the masses of the people, will come in and give of their means for the purpose of paying the expenses of this grand centennial.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to detain the committee only a few moments longer. We have heard a great deal about this voting away of three millions of the people's money. Sir, when you look over the vast sums of money that have been voted away during the past year by this Congress to different States of the Union, it is surprising that this appropriation of three millions for one of the noblest enterprises that ever entered the mind of man should be so higgled over. Let us look at this matter for a few moments. During the last eight years, ending 30th June, 1873, New York has drawn from the national Treasury, for public buildings and river and harbor improvements alone, an aggregate of $15,688,222.22. In view of that fact, I do not think that New York ought to complain of voting her share, eight cents per man, for this great centennial celebration.

Let us go a little further. During the same time the District of Columbia has had about fifteen millions of the people's money, and yet there is a paper published here that has been belittling this great enterprise all through the past winter. I come next to Illinois, that great empire State. But let me state here that I begrudge not these appropriations. I love to see the whole country prosper, and I have no doubt that because the people of those States have received these large grants from the General Government they have advanced much faster in general progress than they otherwise would have done. What has the great State of Illinois, the Empire State of the West, received? The sum of $8,628,177.24. Two years ago, when the fire-fiend swept through the devoted city of Chicago, there was an appeal made to this House, and I feel proud that my vote was recorded in favor of the appropriatiop of $4,000,000 for the purpose of building up the public buildings in that city and giving employment to the poor laboring men who had been burned out of house and home; and yet, sir, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARD] tells us that Illinois has paid so much in taxes. Well, sir, that shows that she has business; that shows that she has business whereby her people are employed, and she is enabled to pay it. She pays no more than her share pro rata. She does not pay an unequal tax.

Let us come now to the State of Massachusetts, from which comes the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman who in his late speech here counsels economy. What has Massachusetts received within the last eight years? The sum of $6,171,177.65. The small State of Massachusetts—small in territory but in nothing else—has received that much, and we know she has absorbed a great deal of the currency we have been talking about so much lately.

Now comes Pennsylvania—the great State of Pennsylvania, an empire within herself, with next to the largest city on this continent, with a system of railways and canals unequaled by any other State, and with, to her honor be it said, the only line of American steamships plying between the Atlantic coast and European ports. New York, with all her wealth and commerce, has none but steamers built on foreign shores; but the great city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, has a line built at her own wharves in her own city, of steamers—and what has she received during that time? Let me tell you; she has received $3,574,564; only a little more than half what the small State of Massachusetts has received, and only a little more than half what the State of Illinois has received. And yet we are here to-day caviling whether for a great national enterprise this Congress shall vote $3,000,000 to be expended in the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Chairman, I should not feel that I could go home to my constituents, I should not feel that I should be a true representative of my State and of my people, if I voted against this measure. It is merely an act of justice to Pennsylvania. After we have voted this sum she will not have had anything like her just proportion of the national funds. The State of Maine has received about $2,500,000; and I am glad to know that the majority of her Representatives here to-day are in favor of according justice to Pennsylvania by helping this great and noble enterprise, which will undoubtedly result in great honor and prosperity to our common country.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. O'NEILL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HOSKINS reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 2986) to appropriate $3,000,000 in aid of the centennial celebration and international exhibition of 1876, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. KELLEY, (at ten o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned until to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock a. m.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANNING: The memorial of 158 soldiers of Cincinnati, Ohio, in relation to modifications of the homestead laws, so that homesteads may be secured by soldiers, sailors, and marines by settling and improving the same within ten years from time of selection, to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. COBURN: The petition of William C. Margedant, late captain Tenth Ohio Volunteers, for arrears of pay, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LEACH: Papers relating to the destruction by fire of the court-house at Lexington, North Carolina, while occupied as officers' quarters and barracks by United States troops, to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. LOWE: The petition of citizens of Kansas for a post-route from Burlington via Big Creek, Byron, Coloma, and Kalida, to Buffalo, in Kansas, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire: The petition of John Fritz, for extension of patent for rolling-mills, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. SAYLER, of Indiana: The petition of Torrey & Tilton, for extension of patent for door-spring, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. TREMAIN: The petition of E. M. Dennison, for compensation as crier of the supreme court of the District of Columbia from April, 1863, to December, 1865, to the Committee on Claims.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 7, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3073) to amend section 19 of the act approved August 18, 1866, entitled "An act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 2246) relating to circuit courts of the United States for the district of Alabama was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MORSE MEMORIAL ADDRESSES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed five thousand copies of the memorial services which were held in the House of Representatives April 16, 1872, in commemoration and honor of the late Samuel F. B. Morse; thirty-five hundred of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and fifteen hundred for the use of the Senate.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending legislation by Congress authorizing the sale of the military reservation at Camp Cady, California; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of George McCoy, late acting assistant surgeon United States Army, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented forty petitions, numerously signed by citizens of different places in the State of Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation for the speedy improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers and the mouth of the Mississippi River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. STOCKTON. I present the memorial of the executive committee of the board of commissioners of pilotage of the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (S. No. 675) to relieve ships and vessels from compulsory pilot fees in certain cases. I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STOCKTON. As the remonstrance is very short, but a page or two, and on a matter of vital importance to the commerce of the country, I move that it be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the motion to print will be referred to the Committee on Printing, under the rules.

Mr. ANTHONY. I present a memorial of the journeymen printers of Washington, District of Columbia, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 689 to further regulate the Government Printing Office, and to reduce the wages of printers. The memorialists allege that the cost of living is much greater in Washington than in other cities, and that to fix the rate of mechanical labor in the city of Washington at the same price paid in New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore, would be of great injury to the rights of labor.

I also present a memorial of the journeymen book-binders of Washington, to the same effect, and also a memorial of the journeymen pressmen, to the same effect. I move their reference to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of Joseph H. Colton, of New York, praying Congress to constrain the government of Bolivia to make just and speedy reparation for the alleged repeated and ruinous wrongs which that government has inflicted on him; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of George Bagnall, of Atchison County, Kansas, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FENTON. I present the memorial of the chiefs of the Onondaga Nation of Indians, residing on their reservation in Onondaga County, New York, who say that they have received a copy of the bill (S. No. 640) to provide a settlement with the Six Nations of New York Indians of questions growing out of unexecuted treaty stipulations, which relates to several nations or remnants of tribes of Indians in New York. They say they have convened councils of their chiefs and warriors, and have carefully considered the provisions of the bill, and have come to the unanimous conclusion to earnestly and respectfully remonstrate against its passage. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of citizens of Chicago, praying for an amendment to the bill now pending regulating the transportation of swine by railroad, so as not to make it imperative to unload and reload them unnecessarily while in transit; which was referred to the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of Thomas Sprinkle, of Oil Creek, Indiana, praying to be released from a bid on a mail contract; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

EXPORTATION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I rise to make a motion which I am sure the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Iowa will concur with me in, to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits and amendatory of the acts in relation thereto was passed yesterday. I will state, if the Senate please, the reason for it, which is very brief and I think conclusive, or will let it lie over, as may be preferred.

The reason why I wish this bill reconsidered is because as it stands it cannot be comprehended by anybody. Instead of repealing the amended portions of the law and re-enacting them as they are proposed to be, the bill provides for amending the existing law "by inserting in the second proviso of the said section, after the word 'given' and before the word 'for' the, words 'to the collector of the port;' and after the words 'bill of lading,' and before the word 'or,' the words 'or any other port without the jurisdiction of the United States.'" And so it goes through, striking out in certain parts of a section certain words and putting in other parts of the section certain other words without giving the meaning or connection.

Now, Mr. President, I think this applies what we call modern improvements to the plan of the Roman emperor who had his edicts written in small characters and suspended from high pillars, for I think any man who is obliged to be governed by that law, and who is subject to penalties if he violates it, would rather climb up a lamp-post and read it than attempt to make it out from this bill.

I do not know anything about the bill, nor does anybody else except the gentleman who reported it, nor do the people know anything about it; but I propose that it shall be recommitted to the Committee on Finance, and that the parts which they propose to amend shall be repealed and then re-enacted as they desire to have them, so that whoever is governed by the law may read it and understand what he is obliged to do.

Mr. SHERMAN. The complaint made by the Senator from Rhode Island is simply a matter of form, and so far as it goes it is a proper criticism; but the bill passed yesterday was to amend the act relative to the exportation of spirits very slightly, affecting only two provisions of the law; and yet to do what the Senator from Rhode Island proposes would require the recital of two or three very long sections. At all events, the bill passed the House of Representatives in the form in which it came to us, and as now modified it is easily understood by anybody. It simply modifies the first proviso of a certain section of the present law. I suppose it would be better to recite the section in full, but it is scarcely worth while to make a point on a bill of this practical importance. The bill originated in the House of Representatives. If it originated in the Senate, I think the criticism would have been proper, and we should have put it in the form the Senator proposes.

All our recent internal-revenue laws, which must originate in the House of Representatives, have been framed in this way. We have objected to it ourselves and tried to correct it in many cases by reciting the section amended over again; but to do this would be a serious embarrassment and create delay in the present case. The bill itself is only intended to facilitate the exportation of spirits in bond by removing one or two restrictions that have been found in practice to be inconvenient. To carry out the idea of the Senator we should have to recite three long sections, because three sections are affected by the modifications contained in this bill. The bill having passed the House in this form and being now agreed to by the Senate, there being no objection to the substance of the matter, it is scarcely worth while for us to send it back to the House in a new draught.

Mr. ANTHONY. But has it not been amended in the Senate, so that it must go back to the House?

Mr. SHERMAN. Simply by striking out portions.

Mr. ANTHONY. The only objection to promulgating this bill as a law in a way in which it can be understood, the only objection to having the law so that the people can understand it, rather than having it so that nobody can understand it, is that the bill will have to go back to the House; but it must go back to the House anyhow. It does not take long to recite three sections in a bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is easy for any one to take this bill as passed by us, and having a copy of the old law in his hand, he can at once see more quickly under the bill as it now stands the changes made in the existing law than he could if we were to recite three long sections. He would have to compare the existing sections with the new ones, word by word, until he should find the difference between the two. I really think, therefore, that for directness of reference and quickness of perception of the changes made by the bill the present form is better, though I do not like it. At any rate, I think it is scarcely worth while to go through the form of changing the bill on a matter of taste rather than of substance.

Mr. HOWE. I do not quite comprehend the force of the criticism urged here by the Senator from Ohio. I do not see that it would be at all necessary to recite the three sections you want to amend in order to amend them. I do not see any difficulty in your writing right down there the law as you mean it shall be hereafter, and having it all in one section.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Rhode Island himself proposes to recommit the bill so that we shall recite the sections as they will stand when modified. That is the proposition. The amendments made relate to provisos in sections. We simply say the first proviso shall be so changed as to read so and so. There is no difficulty or doubt as to the meaning of the change and the purpose of the change.

Mr. HOWE. If any one interested in the law has the Statutes at Large in his possession, undoubtedly he can take this bill, and if he is good in mathematics, if he is equal, as the Senator from New York would say, to the labor of casting an eclipse, he could undoubtedly figure out from this bill and from the Statutes at Large what the law on this subject is to be after this bill becomes a law; but he would have to have that library and this law and that familiarity with mathematics in order to do it, whereas the committee which sends this bill here, without any reference to the previous sections at all, if they please can just write down the law as they mean it shall stand hereafter, and whoever has that law in his hand will know by what rule his conduct is to be guided.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say a word on the motion made by the Senator from Rhode Island. There are provisions in some of the State constitutions that in amendments to a statute the statute itself shall be re-enacted in the form proposed. I have thought since I have been here that it were infinitely better that we amended our laws in the same way; but it is a practice uniform here, and I have not known any exception to it, that we have amended statutes precisely as is proposed by this bill. This bill came from the House and was reported to the Senate, and was passed yesterday, and there was no objection at the time suggested to the bill by any one. Now it is proposed, when the bill has passed the Senate, and as I suppose gone to the House as thus amended, to reconsider the vote, not because there is any objection to the principle of the bill, but because of the form. I confess that I do not like the form; but ever since I have been here every amendment that has been made to an internal-revenue law, or any law affecting the revenue and almost everything else, has been precisely in the form this has been.

I insist that my friend, the Senator from Rhode Island, shall not make the rule operate on this particular bill now that it has passed and gone to the House of Representatives. But if he shall insist hereafter on this point when a bill shall come up in this form, I will stand by him as readily as any one and do what I can in my humble way to have a better rule inaugurated and carried out. I believe it ought to be done; but as this bill has already passed and there is no objection to the principle of the bill, and especially as I understand the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has these laws published in pamphlet form in a convenient size, and when they are thus published they are put in such form as that the amendments are incorporated and the whole section as it stands is seen together, I do not think the objection obtains as suggested here. I concede that in the Statutes at Large laws should be precisely as we pass them; but when the department make up the revenue laws and publish them in pamphlet form, I understand it is otherwise and the sections are brought together so as to show the effect of all changes. In this particular case I do not think the difficulty obtains that the Senator from Rhode Island suggests, or at least to the extent he suggests. I do not believe there will be so much trouble in understanding this statute as he thinks. I suggest, therefore, that the better way is to let this matter pass as it is, especially as it is a matter of vital importance that this law should be passed at as early a day as possible, for numberless enterprises connected with the exportation of liquors are now suffering for want of the amendment to the statute proposed by the bill we acted on yesterday.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the best time to correct a bad practice is the earliest time, and I am glad the Senator from Rhode Island has called attention to this practice. There are to be found in the legislation of Congress two features each of which is an anomaly in legislation. One is the use frequently made of a proviso. Of course the design of a proviso is to limit, restrain, or qualify. If you open the statute-book you find a minor provision perhaps, and another, and at the end a proviso more substantive, more affirmative, more operative than all the rest of the act. I have ventured before to call attention to this. I think it a vice in legislation.

The other feature to which I refer is that to which the Senator from Rhode Island has called attention. The wish of the Senate is to make certain changes in the internal-revenue laws. I ask my honorable friend from Iowa whether there is any difficulty or any inconvenience in writing down, as the Senator from Wisconsin suggested, just what we mean the law to be, adding "that all provisions inconsistent with the enactment are hereby repealed?" The Senator from Ohio speaks of reciting several sections. Surely, that is not necessary, I submit to the honorable Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. To carry out the idea of the Senator from Rhode Island, it is.

Mr. CONKLING. It may be the Senator from Rhode Island used that expression. I did not observe it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The constitutions of several States of the Union, I think of Rhode Island, require that whenever a statute is changed in any particular by a subsequent law, the whole law as changed shall be recited.

Mr. CONKLING. I know that is the law in some of the States. It might be objectionable in practice here owing to the vast volume of legislation; but I submit with deference to the honorable Senator from Ohio and the honorable Senator from Iowa that there can be no difficulty in this case—and I have been looking at the bill—in affirming precisely what we say the law shall be, and then annulling conflicting provisions. Let us see in the first three or four lines of this bill what must be done by a lawyer who wants to cite in court this section:

That section 55 of the act of July 20, 1868, as amended by the act of June 6, 1872, and by the act of March 3, 1873—

There are three acts, to begin with, in different volumes, with which he must provide himself, and he must carry these into court. These three acts are to—be further amended by striking out the words "such bonds" where they first occur in said section, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "a transportation bond;" by inserting in the second proviso of said section, after the word "given" and before the word "for," the words "to the collector of the port."

And so on; I will not follow it to the end. These sections are not numbered alike in all these acts. They are intended to be, but it will be found perplexing to trace the identity of numbers. I have had occasion recently to go over the several internal-revenue acts of Congress; and if there is anything next to hunting for a needle in a hay-stack, it is the task of tracing out, by identity the sections in their numbers or otherwise, the history of a special point of legislation in these acts. The Senator from Iowa referred to a compilation of these laws. I do not criticise it further than to say that after exhausting much time and more patience upon it I went back to the Statutes at Large, and worked many hours to trace through these succeeding acts a provision less hidden than this will be.

I think, Mr. President, that this is a good time to begin to correct this evil; I wish we could correct the other also. I wish when we have a bit of affirmative legislation it could be made a section, and not put in a proviso, and a proviso frequently following after something having little or nothing to do with it in logical or legislative sequence; and then I wish that, in place of legislating by relation, referring to an act as amended by another act and that as amended by another act, and then declaring that certain words be inserted, or inserted in lieu of words where they first or last occur, we might, in an instance which seems to me as feasible as this, state the law as we say it should be, and then repeal conflicting sections. With that done, see the ease with which this act can be cited. It will go into a volume of the statutes and into a compilation of the statutes. One book, one page, one section tells the whole story, and no man need search in all these other statutes. Why? Because he knows that whenever he finds anything conflicting with that it is repealed by the act then before him, and thus he is exempted from labor; whereas in the mode of legislation proposed, he must go back and ravel it out by stitches, and pick it out of all the crevices and detailed provisions of these acts, either one of which makes not a volume but a very considerable pamphlet of itself.

I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, and I think he has made it in a case in which it is not only applicable but feasible.

Mr. ANTHONY. I was unfortunate in making myself understood if I was understood as proposing to refer this bill back to the Committee on Finance with any instructions. I did not so intend. I prefer to recommit it to the committee, and I indicated the purpose for which I wish it recommitted, leaving it to the committee to report in such a way as they may deem proper.

The practice of amending an act in the way proposed in this bill is of recent origin. I fancy it was never known when the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] first came into this Chamber. I think it was not known when I first came into this Chamber. I think it has grown up within ten years. I remember once we amended the whole internal revenue and customs duties system in this way, by striking out from and after the word "whereas" the fourth time it occurs in the fourth section of a certain act certain words, and putting in some other words. No lawyer could understand it; nobody could understand it; and of course the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue were compelled to prepare one act by taking the two acts of Congress and putting them together in the way in which they would read if they were one act. But every man who was bound by that law was subject to any mistakes which might have been made in this putting of the two acts together.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me, I beg to call his attention to the extraordinary theory and practice of passing an act on purpose to have an executive officer perform the function of legislation, to wit, amending it in form so as to make apparent to the eyesight the act as it was intended to be amended. As I hear him state it now, it strikes me as a fresh wonder that that mode should be deemed a proper mode of legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to submit to the Senator from Rhode Island that, if he simply enter the motion to reconsider so as to keep the bill here, I will look again at the law and at the connection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator that the bill has already been sent to the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be recalled for the purpose of entering the motion to reconsider, and I will look at it and see whether it is practicable by a few words to make these changes, though I would prefer that the bill should be allowed to stand, because we have been pressed on account of the harsh operation of certain features of the existing law on the ordinary business of the country. If, however, the Senator desires now to make the point, he has a right to do it.

Mr. ANTHONY. The mode which the Senator suggests I prefer to recommitting the bill. I understand he will prepare the bill in such form as he thinks it ought to be and as I think it ought to be, and then have it reconsidered and that form substituted and sent to the House, instead of this, all of which can be done in two hours.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I desire is to let it lie on the table until we look at it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] thinks it can be done without reciting the sections as they will stand amended.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the sections ought to be recited as they stand amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is the very point where the Senator differs from the Senator from New York and the Senator from Wisconsin. The criticism of the Senator from New York is that this is an act in the fourth degree from the original act, and that when you amend section 55 of the original act you should state that you amend it so as to read as follows, and then insert the amended section at length. Suppose that is done now; then hereafter when you want to amend that you would have to recite all the previous chain of acts which lead to the recital of this last act. This is a third amendment to section 55 of a certain act; and in order to trace the history, when we come to amend it again it is proposed that we shall state that a certain act levying internal taxes, as amended by a certain act, as amended by a certain other act, and as finally amended by another act, shall be amended so as to read so and so, thus reciting all the laws on that subject. You will find, if we adopt the mode proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island, of reciting the section as it will stand amended, that it will lead to the complication which the Senator from New York points out.

Now, as the whole internal-revenue laws have been based on this, I confess, faulty system of amendment, to avoid in some cases prolixity in the law, I think it better to let this bill pass; it is not a striking case; and our attention having been called to the matter now, we will endeavor hereafter carefully to specify distinctly the amendments that are made. If, however, the Senator from Rhode Island desires to press his proposition now, it had better lie on the table, and I will see whether I can suit him.

Mr. ANTHONY. That suits me. Let it lie on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. But the bill should be recalled from the House, or it will be beyond our reach.

Mr. ANTHONY. The bill is recalled on entering the motion to reconsider. All I care about is that the law shall be promulgated so that the people who are bound to obey it can understand it. That I think an American citizen is entitled to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I want to ask the Senator from Rhode Island, inasmuch as there is no objection to the principle of this bill and as the Senator from Ohio has suggested that it is important that it should go into operation as soon as possible, that he do not apply the rule to this particular case. The Senator from Ohio and myself, and other members of the Finance Committee, have had our attention called to the importance of having this bill passed as soon as possible. I therefore ask the Senator from Rhode Island that he withdraw his motion as applied to this particular bill; and, our attention being called to the point, we concede the vice to which he refers. I have myself more than once called attention to it in committee and here. I know it is wrong; but I suggest that he let this bill stand passed as it is, and I shall be ready to stand by him in applying the rule hereafter.

Mr. CONKLING. There is one suggestion which I omitted to make, and my attention has been called to it by another Senator. The Senate may know that the House of Representatives has recently acted upon the revision of the laws so called. The work is before the Committee on the Revision of the Laws of this body, and will be reported soon. The Senate is also aware that the scheme and intention of that work is to present a truthful epitome, the substance plainly, of all the statute law as it now stands. It will occur to every Senator, in view of the coming revision, that we cannot commence too soon to change this cumbrous practice of legislation. The purpose of the revision being to condense and simplify the law as it now stands scattered in many sections, it seems to me that the legislation, the thread of which will be taken up where the revision leaves off, ought, and ought at once, to be made to conform to the plan of that work; and I hope the Senator from Iowa will take the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio and let the bill come back and look at it, and if the committee finds they can change the form, it will be the work of a short time.

Mr. WRIGHT. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from New York that there will be quite as little difficulty in this epitome of the statutes, as proposed, to incorporate this change as we propose it here.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend will pardon me for saying that no such thing is possible. I will say now, although it would be more timely in future, that if we are to adopt the report of the revision of the laws at all, it must be acted on in block. We cannot amend it, and carry it at the present session; and the idea of adding to it by bringing it down beyond December, 1873, is utterly futile, as every Senator will see if he reflects. All we can do with the revision of the laws is to complete that which has undergone the work of commissioners and more recently of a special commissioner employed under an act of Congress, the action of the other House, and of the committees of both Houses. There is no opportunity to carry this bill should it become a law in any form, or any act that has been passed at the present session of Congress, into the revision of the laws. All we can do is to make the continuation of legislation, from the time at which the revision stops, conform to and harmonious with the theory of the revision. This act in any event is not to be carried into it, and cannot be, nor can any other act passed at this session.

Mr. ANTHONY. Although my object is sufficiently accomplished in calling attention to this matter, yet it is manifest from the remarks of other Senators that if I withdraw the motion it will be renewed.

Mr. CONKLING. You had better recall the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will not the bill be recalled on entering the motion to reconsider?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands. The motion will be entered and the bill recalled from the House of Representatives.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of the legal representatives of Richard Hall, of Maryland, praying compensation for losses sustained during the war with Great Britain, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. LOGAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Mrs. Catharine Barry be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1832) granting a pension to Elizabeth Hackleman, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 659) for the relief of Niel Nielsson, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1335) granting a pension to Guadaloupe Torres, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2220) granting a pension to Andrew J. Baldwin, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2118) for the relief of Elizabeth Clark, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2716) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary C. Reno, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SARGENT. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River," to report it with an amendment; and I ask that it be now considered.

Mr. THURMAN. I suggest to the Senator to postpone that until the morning business is over.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I will call it up immediately after the morning business is through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can withdraw the report and hold it until after the expiration of the morning business.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well; I withdraw it.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 615) to increase the pension of Mrs. Hannah W. Sumner, widow of Major-General Edwin V. Sumner, who died March 21, 1863, while in command of the Department of the West, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of Alexander Henderson, late consul at Londonderry, praying for remuneration for expenses incurred and special services rendered during his term of office, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 440) to amend the act entitled "An act transferring the control of certain territorial penitentiaries to the several Territories in which the same are located," approved January 24, 1873, reported it without amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 598) to refund to the State of Georgia certain money expended by said State for the common defense in 1777, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of William Wheeler Hubbell, praying for settlement of royalty for his explosive shell and fuse patents in the naval service, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 785) to settle for the inventions and patents of William Wheeler Hubbell.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel S. Potter, praying for payment for use of his buildings as a hospital, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 786) for the relief of Samuel S. Potter.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the petition of William B. Bary, relative to the adoption of his patent combined letter-sheet and envelope by the postal service of the United States, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 692) to make uniform the pensions of widows of staff officers of the Navy, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1673) granting a pension to Isaac Stevens, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2214) granting a pension to Ann Humphreys, of Philadelphia, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2353) granting a pension to Lucy Ann Cummings, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PATTERSON subsequently said: This morning House bill No. 2353 was reported adversely from the Committee on Pensions, and postponed indefinitely. If there be no objection I ask that the indefinite postponement be reconsidered and the bill, with the adverse report of the committee, placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to ask the Senator whether another bill of which I spoke to him was reported also?

Mr. PATTERSON. No, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I was going to ask that that also be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 240) granting a pension to John C. Farnam, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2116) for the relief of Magdalena Docks, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 870) to place the name of Mary E. Murphy on the pension-roll, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2794) granting a pension to Elizabeth Wolf, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Sarah M. Smead, widow of the late Captain Raphael C. Smead, praying for an increase of pension, reported adversely thereon; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. THURMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 610) to authorize the correction of the boundaries of certain lands in California, to report it back, with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed. I ask the Senator from California who introduced the bill whether he wants it to go on the Calendar or to be acted upon at once?

Mr. HAGER. I stated at the time I introduced the bill that I introduced it by the request of certain parties. I stated that I probably would not support its provisions myself. Perhaps, to give the parties an opportunity to be heard, it had better be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. THURMAN. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 611) for the relief of settlers on certain lands in the State of California, to make a similar report, and recommend the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. HAGER. Let it go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report.

SUMNER MEMORIAL ADDRESSES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives to print additional copies of the addresses delivered in the Senate and House of Representatives on the death of Charles Sumner, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed three thousand copies for the use of the Senate and five thousand copies for the use of the House of Representatives of the addresses made in the Senate and in the House of Representatives upon the death of Hon. Charles Sumner, and that the Secretary of the Treasury have printed the portrait of Mr. Sumner to accompany the same.

The resolution was concurred in.

GOLD MINT BARS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report a bill; and I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject which I ask may be read, and the bill, if there be no objection, put on its passage. The bill has but a single object in view.

The bill (S. No. 784) authorizing the transfer of gold mint bars from the bullion fund of the assay office, New York, to the assistant treasurer at New York, was, by unanimous consent, read three times, and passed. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time transfer to the office of the assistant treasurer at New York, from the bullion fund of the assay office at New York, refined gold bars bearing the United States stamp of fineness, weight, and value, or bars from any melt of foreign gold coin or bullion of standard equal to or above that of the United States, and may apply the same to the redemption of coin certificates or in exchange for gold coin at not less than par, subject to such regulations as he may prescribe.

WOLF RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3028) giving the assent of Congress for the improvement of the Wolf River across the Menomonee Indian reservation in the State of Wisconsin, to report it back with the recommendation that it pass. I ask that the bill be put on its passage now.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It gives the assent of Congress to the Weshena Improvement Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, improving the Wolf River so as to run logs down that river across the Menomonee Indian reservation, in accordance with the laws of that State. Any damages which may be caused on account of such improvements shall be awarded as in all other cases under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, and the amount be paid to the Indian agent for the benefit of the Indians; and the Indians and all other persons shall be permitted to use the river for the purpose of running logs; and the charges for this privilege shall be regulated by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin. All privileges under the act may be altered or revoked by Congress.

Mr. SARGENT. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce that instead of having this money paid to the agent for the benefit of the Indians, it be paid into the Treasury for the benefit of the Indians. We may then appropriate it. We do not know how much it will be. It may be $1,000 or $100,000. If it is paid into the hands of the agent for the benefit of the Indians, the Indians may never know anything about it.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. This is a House bill and the committee did not think it advisable to make the change suggested, although it was thought of. The Indian agents are responsible for funds that they receive.

Mr. SARGENT. For any funds they receive from the Government they are unquestionably liable; but this is to be received from outside parties, and I think it had better go into the Treasury for the benefit of the Indians. Then we can appropriate it for them.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to amend the bill by striking out in line 11 the words "Indian agent" and inserting "the Treasury of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REFERENCE OF A DOCUMENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the 9th of April, 1874, the Secretary of the Treasury sent a letter, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate, information in relation to receiving and disposing of revenue-stamps and public moneys, and the document was printed but was not referred. I move now that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Appropriations have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAVIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 787) to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS subsequently said: I think the bill introduced by the Senator from West Virginia just now respecting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary. That committee has always had jurisdiction of that subject, and has some bills before it now touching the same question.

Mr. DAVIS. I moved the reference of the bill to the Committee on Claims for the reason that that committee has already a bill of a similar nature before it and has somewhat considered the subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very good.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall have no objection to its going to the Committee on the Judiciary for inspection afterward, if it is deemed necessary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will make no motion on the subject.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 788) amendatory of and supplemental to an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GORDON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 789) for the relief of Thomas G. Rawlings for the benefit of his northern creditors; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 790) for the relief of Mrs. Catharine Barry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 791) for the relief of the settlers on the odd numbered sections within the limits of the Northern Pacific Railroad and the Territory of Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

NAVAL PROMOTIONS.

Mr. THURMAN. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs are hereby instructed to report to the Senate whether under the existing laws a promotion to the rank of rear-admiral can be lawfully made without a previous examination of the officer promoted according to the provisions of the act of Congress on the subject of promotion, approved July 16, 1862.

I wish to say in reference to this resolution that there is a difference of opinion upon the question whether or not a candidate for promotion to the rank of rear-admiral must be examined by a board, as is required in the case of all promotions below that grade. There is some difference of opinion on that subject, and some hard feeling has arisen in respect to it; and it is for the purpose of having a report which shall settle the question that I offer the resolution.

Mr. SARGENT. I will state that that matter was investigated by the Committee on Naval Affairs pending a nomination that was before them. They went into the whole subject and also consulted the Secretary of the Navy upon it. It might be well, however, that that report should take a written form and be printed, going so far as it does toward settling the question.

Mr. THURMAN. That is what I desire.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORTATION ROUTES.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five thousand extra copies of the report and appendix thereto of the Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board be printed; and that one thousand copies of said report and appendix, together with the evidence taken, be printed, and that said copies be sent by the Public Printer to any person applying for the same, and who will send to him the cost of transportation of such document either by mail or express.

And be it resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to report suitable measures for the distribution of public documents.

THE GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 7, called the Geneva award bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Before that is done, I ask that I be allowed to make the report which I withdrew a few moments ago.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is that?

Mr. SARGENT. A report from the Committee on Appropriations on the bill which was recommitted to the committee the day before yesterday, affording relief to the sufferers from the Mississippi overflow; and I should like to have it acted upon at once. I think it will not lead to any lengthy discussion. If anything is done, it ought to be done at once. I made the report during the morning hour, but on the suggestion of the Chair withdrew it until the expiration of the morning hour. I think it will not take more than ten or fifteen minutes to dispose of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course it is obvious that that report cannot be considered to-day if it leads to any discussion, because a single objection will carry it over. I do not object to the report being made.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not propose to discuss it myself for more than five minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill to which I refer ought to be taken up and passed. I believe our honor is partly involved in it toward certain people of the United States. If it be taken up, I shall have no objection to allowing it to be laid aside informally to see how long the Senator's bill will take.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well; I will agree to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say in regard to the bill in respect to the Geneva award, that of course I have no objection to its being taken up; but I must ask that it shall not be pressed to a vote to-day. I wish to submit some observations to the Senate upon it, and my papers are not here; they are at my house.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I gave you notice yesterday.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not receive it. I was out of the Senate if any such notice was given.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is perfectly useless to take up this bill unless we are going to have a vote upon it. That was my object in moving to take it up. If the Senator is not ready, of course I cannot insist upon it to-day; but when it is taken up I shall ask that it be stuck to until it is disposed of.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I must ask the Senator to postpone his motion until to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well. I give notice, then, that to-morrow at one o'clock I shall move to take up the bill.

EXPORTATION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. SARGENT. I now ask leave to report back from the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I am informed that on the bill which upon the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] the Senate has ordered to be recalled from the House of Representatives, the House have ordered a committee of conference upon other points, and that may lead to the very result which he desires to accomplish. I suggest to him whether he had not better let the matter go to the committee of conference and let the bill remain as it is, in the possession of the House.

Mr. ANTHONY. That will accomplish my purpose precisely. The committee of conference can report the bill, I may say, as an intelligible bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am informed by a member of the Committee on Ways and Means that that is the action of the House, and they were at a loss to know what the Senate wished in regard to the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to withdrawing my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of House bill No. 2081 is withdrawn.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS FROM MISSISSIPPI-RIVER OVERFLOW.

Mr. SARGENT. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River," to report it back with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to add, as an additional section, the following:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is directed to issue temporarily supplies of food and disused Army clothing for support and to prevent starvation and extreme want to any and all classes of helpless or destitute persons who have been rendered so by reason of the recent overflow of the Mississippi River, and to make report to Congress of such issue of food and clothing and the condition and situation of such destitute people; and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for such supplies of food or rations: Provided, That the authority hereby conferred upon the Secretary of War shall expire on the 1st day of September, 1874.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, there are two changes in this amendment from the form in which it was presented the day before yesterday by the committee. In the first place we have struck out the words "the State of Mississippi," and made the appropriation more general. We have done this because we are satisfied by the examination of persons before the committee who are familiar with the country and the ravages produced by this immense inundation, and by the newspapers from that section which we have had before the committee and examined, and by representations made by local committees in the form of circulars appealing generally for help, that there is in the State of Louisiana, and to a much less extent in the States of Mississippi and Arkansas and a portion of Missouri, a wide-spread devastation caused by this unusual, exceptional overflow, and that there are thousands of persons—I do not overstate it—who have taken refuge from the high water in such shelter as they could find, on the tops of their houses, on the tree tops, &c., who need food and who need clothing; that their provisions have been swept away; that many lives have been lost; and that this is a great disaster which the nation alone is adequate to cope with.

We have also increased the appropriation from $60,000 to $100,000, and I regret to say that I fear we are giving but a drop in the bucket for the relief of the sufferers from this great calamity. There has been naturally one evil result of the delay in the Senate in acting upon this matter heretofore and the recommittal of the bill, and that is this: as it would naturally be supposed that Congress would have the highest information and the best judgment as to the extent of this calamity, it neglecting to act in view of that information, private persons would not be likely to be very generous in their contributions; and the effect of our delay, I fear, has been to stay to a certain extent the contributions which were being made by different cities and by different individuals for this object. It is due to the persons who are thus terribly situated and who need this relief that, if it is granted, it should be granted at once; and for that reason the committee have instructed me to ask the Senate to pass upon the bill at once, and that this relief be furnished.

I have before me, if any Senator desires further information on this matter, extracts from newspapers where the intelligence most concentrates and which are best informed, substantiating what I have said, and giving details of the most distressing description of the condition of these people who are being flooded. I find that it is not merely black people, but white people, who are suffering; that their industries are being destroyed; that their opportunities for work have been cut away; their stocks of provisions and clothing have been destroyed.

It seems to me this is one of those great calamities as to which we ought to do something. I think we ought to do much more than is proposed by this bill. I will not, however, take up the time of the Senate in further discussion, unless some Senator shall require more specific information than I have given in the remarks I have already made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SARGENT. The title of the bill should be amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Attorney-General, communicating, in answer to Senate resolution of April 30, 1874, a copy of the correspondence in the cases of James Barclay and T. M. Rouse against Lieutenant G. A. Goodale, United States Army, for false imprisonment; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Attorney-General, transmitting, in compliance with a Senate resolution of January 21, 1874, information relative to the sale of Government property at Harper's Ferry; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

THE CUSTOMS SERVICE.

Mr. FENTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 13.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the title of the bill be read for information.

Mr. FENTON. It is the bill relating to the customs service and the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. No. 13) to regulate the service in the collection of customs at the various ports of entry in the United States, and the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the laws relating to customs, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. Is it the intention of the Senator to speak upon the bill or to take it up for action?

Mr. FENTON. I desire to have the bill acted upon. I do not think it will lead to any debate. I am not desirous of speaking upon it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to its consideration; but it occurred to me, as this seemed to be an off day, that we might give the poor Calendar a chance.

Mr. FENTON. This bill will take but very little time, I think. It relates to the machinery of the customs service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It will be reported in full.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What committee reported the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recollects that the Committee on Commerce were discharged from the consideration of the bill. It has not been reported by a committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has not been considered by a committee then?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been reported by a committee. It was referred to the Committee on Commerce, but that committee were discharged from its further consideration, on the motion of the Senator from New York, [Mr. FENTON.]

Mr. FENTON. I desire to say, however, for the information of the Senator from Vermont, that it is the identical bill formerly reported from the Committee on Finance, but which was subsequently referred to the Committee on Commerce, and from the consideration of which they were discharged a day or two ago.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I do not know what the custom of the Senate is on a question of this kind; but it strikes me as not being particularly proper for a Senator to ask that a committee be discharged from the consideration of a bill and then have that bill brought up for the consideration of the Senate. I think the bill should be reported from a committee.

Mr. FENTON. This bill has been reported from a committee. It was fully considered by the Committee on Finance a year and a half ago, reported from that committee unanimously, placed upon the Calendar, and made a special order; but the Committee on Commerce now a little over a year ago deemed that it should pass through their official hands, and finally it was referred to that committee. They failed to act upon it; upon my motion the day before yesterday they were discharged from its further consideration, and it was brought before the Senate. I know of no good reason now for its further consideration by any committee. I suppose the Senate will feel competent to pass upon it.

Mr. MORTON. Has the bill been taken up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. FENTON. Let it be read.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It seems that this bill was considered by a committee of another Congress and not by any committee of this Congress. If the Senator is disposed to have the bill referred to the Committee on Finance, and that committee shall report the bill, I certainly will not object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no motion made to refer the bill. The bill will be read if no motion is made.

Mr. FENTON. I have no doubt that the Committee on Finance would authorize me or some other member of the committee to report it back at once; and if that course is more agreeable to the Senate, I will make no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill, but was interrupted by

Mr. BOREMAN. It occurs to me that that is a bill which ought to be reported upon by a committee. There is too much of detail in it for it to be considered here in the Senate without the report of a committee of the body. Whatever may have been done in former Congresses, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. FENTON. The Senate have just discharged the Committee on Commerce from the further consideration of the bill. I was about to consult the chairman of the Committee on Finance with the view of adopting the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut, if there was no objection on the part of members of the Finance Committee, to the end that the bill might be reported back again from that committee at an early day and put upon its passage. If the Senator from West Virginia will allow the Clerk to proceed with the reading of the bill until I have an opportunity to confer with the chairman of the Finance Committee, I have no doubt that disposition can be made of it. My only desire in the matter is to reach early action upon it.

Mr. CHANDLER. This bill was before the Committee on Commerce for some time, but the House of Representatives was investigating the same subject, and the committee decided to await the action of the House; and that was the cause of the delay. It is a very important measure, and it is a subject that will require a good deal of discussion and very close and rigid examination. I do not care what committee takes it in charge, whether it be the Committee on Finance or the Committee on Commerce, but it should be carefully examined and revised by some committee of the body.

Mr. BOREMAN. I am inclined to think that the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the care of this bill without much consideration by the Senate. I heard nothing of it myself. There was no discussion about it, I apprehend. It was one of those motions that are put without notice and acted on without much consideration. It seems to me that this bill contains many matters that cannot be passed upon in the Senate without a report and such information as can only be gathered by a committee and given to the body, fixing, as it does, the salaries of officers and many things of that sort. I think therefore it should be referred to a committee that we may have such information as they can give us on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FENTON. That would be a very remarkable proceeding. This is certainly an unexpected movement on the part of the Senator from West Virginia. A few days ago I had occasion to give a history of this bill. At that time I stated that it was introduced some two years ago; and after full consideration it was finally, very little changed, reported from the Committee on Finance, and placed upon the Calendar. I have no doubt that the Committee on Finance was the proper committee to whom this subject should be referred. It was so regarded by the Senate in the beginning; but afterward it was thought best for some reason, by some members of the Committee on Commerce, for them to have charge of it; and on the 17th of December a year ago it was referred to that committee in the identical language of the bill now before the Senate. The committee failing to act upon it at that session, on he first day of the present session I again introduced the bill, and asked its reference to the Committee on Commerce. That committee were again silent; but the Senate Finance Committee had fully and thoroughly considered it, and it had received the approval of the then Secretary of the Treasury, the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL;] so I asked that the bill at last be brought before the Senate for action. I consulted the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and he said to me that he had no objection to the committee being discharged from its further consideration, and even went so far as to suggest that, if desirable, it be again referred to the Committee on Finance. I should have asked that reference in the beginning were it not that the Committee on Finance remains very little changed; and I have reason to know that every member of that committee (I think I speak advisedly) approves of this bill; but if it is desired, as I know it is by my honorable friend from Connecticut, that it should go to the Committee on Finance as a formal proceeding, and be reported back again from that committee, I shall not oppose the reference; but I do oppose its being again referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to hear the bill read.

Mr. FENTON. Let it be read through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now before the Senate is, Will the Senate refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I differ a little from the honorable Senator from New York. I do not think the Committee on Finance is the proper committee to whom this bill should be referred; but, as I stated, if it should be referred to that committee, and they should make a report in favor of its passage, I should not then object to its consideration. I think the Committee on Commerce is the committee to which all questions relating to customs should be referred. This bill has been before that committee for some time, as stated; but what are the facts? This very subject has been before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and has been considered there; and that committee has heard testimony from men in favor o a measure similar to this, and also the testimony of men who were opposed to it; they have been investigating this subject with a great deal of thoroughness; and in view of that fact, believing that after such an investigation as they were making they would come to a wise and proper conclusion, the Committee on Commerce of this body did not think it worth while to take such action as was necessary to report the bill. That is the reason why it has not been presented to this body before.

Mr. FENTON. That reason may have prevailed for the last six weeks; but it could not have prevailed prior to that time, because this subject has not been under investigation by the Committee on Ways and Means for a longer period. But further, the matter under investigation by that committee related mainly to the violations of the customs-revenue law, and the bill reported by them, if I may be allowed to refer to the action of the House of Representatives, principally concerns the repeal and modification of these laws. In other words, it does not relate to the machinery of the customs service, to which this bill is directed; and if the bill that is now reported to the House of Representatives should pass that body and this, it would still be necessary, and even more important, that a bill of this character should become a law. This bill in nowise conflicts with the action of the House of Representatives.

But passing from the merits of the proposition itself, which has been fully considered and is easily understood, I have no objection to the bill going to the Committee on Finance, and I have no doubt I shall have the unanimous consent of that committee to report it back in a few days. I ask my friend from West Virginia to modify his motion, and if he does not I will move to amend it, so that the bill may be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not amendable. The end can be reached by voting down the first motion, after which a motion to refer to another committee will be in order.

Mr. FENTON. Then I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. BOREMAN. I have no objection to modifying my motion as the Senator desires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia moves that this bill be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FENTON. That is my motion.

Mr. MORTON. According to my recollection, it is nearly two years ago since this matter was first brought before the Senate. I do not know what has been the history of the bill since that time; I do not know why the question has not been considered; but I do think that the evidence which has been taken during the present session of Congress and recent developments establish the fact that this question ought to be considered by this Congress before it adjourns; that there are evils in the law which ought to be remedied. If it is proper to have this bill go to a committee again, I have no objection; but it ought not to go to any committee to be kept for another two years. The bill ought to be brought back in some form so as to give the Senate a chance to pass upon it before the close of this session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is quite evident on a cursory perusal of this particular bill that it must go to some committee unless the Senate intend to destroy all the machinery that now exists for collecting the revenues of the United States. The bill starts out with undertaking to deal with all the various ports of entry of the United States in respect to the salaries of their officers. It proceeds to deal with about a dozen, I should think, leaving all the rest entirely unprovided for. It then makes a sweeping disposition of the subject of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, out of which all the smaller collection districts in the United States, covering the whole of your thousands and thousands of miles of sea-board and of border, are provided for, and leaving those officers practically to perform their duties for nothing, or the comparatively nominal salaries that the old law, if that be not repealed by this, would still give. So it is perfectly plain that the bill ought not to pass in its present condition.

It may be true, as the Senator from Indiana says, that there are evils in the existing law; but I think it will turn out that the evils to which the Senator refers, so far as they are real, (and that is not nearly so far as is supposed,) chiefly grow out of administration instead of out of law. Take this Sanborn business that is spoken of. That did not grow out of the laws of the United States relating to the customs.

Mr. MORTON. That is not relevant to this matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That grew out of certain very vicious and very special legislation of Congress, for which I think a fine ought to be imposed on everybody that voted for it, or against it either, for aught I know. Certainly it was a very hasty and careless piece of legislation. But when you examine the collection of the customs and the collection of the internal revenue under the general laws of the United States, I think you will find, if you look at the provisions of the law with the disposition to have a law which shall protect innocent importers and manufacturers from undue competition by those who do not pay the duties and the taxes that they ought to pay, that your law can scarcely be amended in the direction of greater liberality toward those who violate it. There is the difficulty; and when abuses grow up under these laws, they are the abuses that arise, as they do in every administration of law, out of the cupidity or dishonesty of some person who is employed to administer the law, and not out of the law itself. Provisions for grand and petit juries, for illustration, have existed almost from time immemorial in this country and in that most highly civilized country from which we derive our jurisprudence—I say the most highly civilized as it respects the protection of general equal rights and the fair and orderly administration of law—and yet everybody knows in his own county and in his own State that sometimes a grand jury is corrupt, and an innocent man is condemned to unjust prosecution; sometimes a petit jury is corrupt, and a just man is condemned to an unjust and unreasonable forfeiture of the loss of his property, and so on. In those cases of course nobody thinks of repealing the provision for grand juries; nobody thinks of overthrowing the right of trial by petit jury; but everybody ought to think of rectifying the personnel of that administration, be it State or national, which leads to any abuses of a good law.

I think it will be found on a careful investigation that whatever of evil there is under the present system of the collection of the taxes and imposts of the United States is most largely due to the fault of particular persons to whom the Government is obliged to intrust the performance of executive duties, who are actuated by the same passions that other people are; some of them turn out to be base ones; and those who undertake to exercise jurisdiction in enforcing a just law, and who have base and selfish motives, will of course so execute that law as to gratify their base and selfish interests. But it does not follow from that that your law ought to be repealed. It follows from that that your base officer ought to be removed and punished vigorously and promptly, and then you have no difficulty with the law. We must not shut our eyes to the fact that these laws have two objects in view: first, the collection of taxes, and in that, secondly, the protection of those innocent and just persons who manfully obey the law by paying in internal revenue and in external revenue all that the law requires them to pay, and make no effort to defraud the Government in any way, whether by commission or omission. Having regard to those interests, we must have a law which is sufficiently strong to be enforced against those who violate it.

Mr. MORTON. Conceding all that the Senator from Vermont says to be true, it does not disprove the necessity of the consideration of this question by Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is perfectly true, and I said so.

Mr. MORTON. If the evils of which we have heard so much do not belong to the law, but simply to the administration of it, that fact ought to be known. If they arise from the character of the law either in whole or in part, and the law should be amended, that fact ought to be known. The alleged facts in regard to the administration of the law are of such a character that Congress is hardly at liberty to let this thing pass another year or two years. I hope, if this bill is referred to any committee, that it will not be allowed to sleep, but that it will be reported back in some form for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. BOREMAN. Mr. President, it might be inferred from what has been said by the Senator from Indiana that the purpose of my motion was to defeat action upon this subject. That is not my purpose. We have committees here for the purpose of considering matters of this sort; indeed everything that may be brought before the Senate for action. This bill, it is admitted, has not been considered by a committee during this Congress. Whatever may have been done heretofore is not to influence us at this time, I apprehend, on this question. Bills have been introduced here for ten, fifteen, and twenty years, and reported upon from time to time during every Congress, and yet when they are introduced anew they are again committed to a committee for consideration and report. Now, sir, I make this motion in good faith——

Mr. MORTON. I do not suspect the Senator of any purpose of the kind that he protests against. I am satisfied, so far as my friend is concerned, that if this bill were referred to a committee of which he was a member it would receive prompt consideration.

Mr. BOREMAN. This subject may need consideration; and I do not want to act upon a bill of this sort, of so much importance as this appears to be, without the report of some committee of this body. Therefore I made the motion, that we might have the report of the proper committee so that we might act advisedly.

Mr. FENTON. It is not necessary to refer the bill at all; still, out of deference to the suggestion, I have consented to have it referred to the Committee on Finance; and I can assure the Senator from West Virginia and other Senators that it will hardly be allowed to rest very long in that committee.

I will not prolong this debate, but remark that my friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has evidently misunderstood the scope and the precise objects of the bill. It does not deal specifically with all the collection districts in the United States, but only with the principal ports of entry. In the sixth section the other ports are grouped together, which is largely the case as the law now stands.

Now, Mr. President, to illustrate what I say, the ports of entry named in this bill specifically, and for which compensations for service are fixed, not including moiety shares, &c., are for the port of New York, $6,000; Boston, $6,000; Philadelphia, $6,000; Baltimore, $6,000; New Orleans, $6,000; and for salary at San Francisco also the sum of $6,000. The compensation at Cincinnati, Chicago, and Saint Louis is $2,500 for the collector of each port.

Beyond this the collection districts of the United States are regulated by special and general acts of Congress, after grouping the districts together, and with varying compensations for the collectors and other officers. As an illustration, in the district of Vermont the salary is $1,000; in the district of Minnesota the salary is also $1,000; and the maximum compensation is made up by commissions from disbursements, by storage charges, and by the moieties or the division from the fines, penalties, and forfeitures through any seizures that may be made at the respective ports of entry, so that the compensations vary in these several ports, reaching from Vermont on the east to the farthest port on Lake Superior in the west, along the northern frontier, say from $500 to nearly $7,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him to point out in this bill any part of it which provides for the compensation hereafter of the collectors of any of the ports except those of New York, Baltimore, Boston, &c., mentioned in the fifth section?

Mr. FENTON. It will remain precisely as it is, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall adjust the compensation as herein stated:

That the salaries of the officers of customs at the ports and districts not herein enumerated shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury at rates commensurate with the duties and responsibilities devolving upon them respectively, in no case to exceed that now received by them from salaries, perquisites, moieties, and other sources whatever.

That is precisely the present law, except that the maximum compensation may be limited by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very much obliged to the Senator from New York—although perhaps it is not necessary now to discuss this question—for the light he has thrown upon the subject. It seems that I am right in saying that this does not fix by statute the compensation of any of these various officers, but in its opening section it provides for all the ports of the United States: "in the various ports in the United States the compensation of such officers shall hereafter be regulated and fixed as follows." Then it fixes the compensation at eight or ten ports, and then, as the Senator says—which I did not allude to, for I did not go over the whole bill—it turns all the rest of the United States into the hands of one man, the Secretary of the Treasury, whoever he may be, to fix the salaries at all the ports of the United States except the few specifically provided for. Now I beg to ask if the Senator himself on reflection thinks that is a wise power to repose in a Secretary of the Treasury? Why, sir, it gives the Secretary of the Treasury as a mere political machine a thousand times the power that any President, democratic or other, in the highest times ever before exercised in his life to control the operations of elections and to control officers. It gives him an army dependent upon his mere will, and not the law, in respect to the compensation they should have, as well as the tenure of their office as it may be now, though certainly the tenure of their office is not now in the control of the Secretary of the Treasury; he has no power over them; but the President may have under existing laws.

This bill as it stands, then, is to turn into the sole control of the Secretary of the Treasury, unadvised by any counsel, uncontrolled by the Executive of the United States, uncontrolled by Congress, the fixing of the salaries and compensation of all the customs officers of the United States except in six or eight of the principal ports.

Mr. FENTON. Allow me to say to the Senator that that is precisely the authority conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury now in respect to almost all the employés under the collectors of customs in the various ports of entry in the United States. It is in some measure the fact at all the different ports of the United States except those enumerated in the bill; and this provision of the bill that is now before the Senate is simply to restrain the Secretary of the Treasury from adjusting these compensations beyond the maximum amount as now received under these various enactments and through these various regulations.

Mr. MORTON. I will say to the Senator that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue now has substantially that power in regard to the salaries of collectors of internal revenue.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Both the Senator from New York and the Senator from Indiana are mistaken. It is not the law that the Secretary of the Treasury has the power to fix the compensation of the collecting officials of the United States.

Mr. FENTON. No; I say he has authority to fix it, not beyond a certain limit, as to the employés under the collectors at the various ports of the United States now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ah, Mr. President, that is a horse of a different color.

Mr. FENTON. Then I stated further that under the various acts of Congress, from 1799 down to 1841 and 1863 inclusive, the compensations of the collectors at the different ports of entry outside of those ports that are mentioned in the bill are subject to variations which are the result of commissions for the disbursement of money that are fixed in numerous instances and which are in some measure determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is vastly mistaken again.

Mr. FENTON. O, no! I am not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me tell the Senator from New York, if he will pardon me, for I know he comes from a much larger port of entry than I do, that the acts of Congress in most of the instances, instead of being the other way, as the Senator says, fix the commissions that are allowed to public officers for the disbursement of moneys; and the Senator will find it so in the statutes. When you come to the compensation, that has already been disposed of; but the Senator was in error upon that subject. When you come to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, as he says it now exists, over these sub-officials, (although I was speaking of the collectors themselves, over whom he has no power at all,) he has it not over sub-officials because all the appointments of the collectors of the various ports of the United States are made by the collectors under the law upon the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; but when a man is once appointed he then becomes an officer of the law, and no mandate of the Secretary of the Treasury can remove him, any more than the Senate can remove a man after we have confirmed him and the President has given him his commission. The power of the Secretary of the Treasury ceases, and wisely it is provided that it shall cease if you intend to administer the Government upon the ideas of the civil-service reform to which my friend and myself are both committed. The power of the Secretary of the Treasury ceases the moment he has approved the nomination of a collector of any of his sub-officials; then he becomes the officer of the law with a compensation fixed by law and beyond the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to remove him or dispose of him. That I understand to be the state of the law. Now the Senator says that this great measure of reform which he is pressing upon us, but which I believe he consents may now be referred again to the Committee on Finance, is to turn over to the Secretary of the Treasury not only these sub-officials who I have shown are not now subject to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, but nearly all the collectors of customs in the United States to have their salary, their commission now fixed by law upon disbursements, their moieties now fixed by law, everything which in substance and fact makes up their compensation, at the sole will and pleasure of the Secretary of the Treasury, except that he shall not make it greater than the sums they now receive. But the honorable Senator has intimated to us more than once, if I remember correctly, that the sums they now receive are extravagant, are enormous; and therefore you are only putting it into the hands of your Secretary of the Treasury still, if he pleases, to make the compensations of all these officers extravagant and enormous, only they are his slaves to have their compensations regulated and doled out according to their faithfulness to him, I suppose up to an enormous sum or down to a starving one. Mr. President, the law of the United States has never yet reposed any such trust in any official of its creation, and I hope it never will.

I make these remarks not with a view to oppose an inquiry into this subject, for I am for the largest inquiry into all subjects which relate to the welfare of the United States; but in what I have said I have endeavored to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we had not better, on any hue and cry of the people who have violated the law or who are said to have violated the law, make haste to plunge out of a state of affairs which may need correction and amendment into one which is as much worse than the existing state of the laws as it is possible to imagine. I desire for one most earnestly that this whole subject shall be investigated to the bottom, and that we may have a statistical and carefully prepared report from the Committee on Finance as to what the extent of the abuses under existing laws is; how they arise, and how largely the clamor on this subject has arisen from people who have knowingly violated the law in fraud of the rights of their co-importers and their co-tax-payers, in fraud of the Treasury, and for their own selfish gain. Such persons, I take it, are not entitled to any large amount of sympathy if they only pay the penalties that the law imposes, and nobody can take more from them. If it turns out that, as the rule, and not as the exception as in the case of trials by jury, innocent men are wronged by the administration of the law, then, most certainly, it ought to be corrected; and nobody should make haste more rapidly than this body to correct it. I am for the investigation; and I only point out now, as it has been drawn into the discussion, what appear to me to be obvious defects in the scheme of the honorable Senator from New York.

Mr. FENTON. I will not continue the dissussion, Mr. President, but will simply remark that the ports at which these colossal sums are received are the ones that are specifically named in the bill.

Now as to the other point. The maximum amount received at any of the other ports which are aggregated together under this general provision of the bill is not quite $7,000; so that in no case can the Secretary of the Treasury go beyond that. Let us see how the compensations are made up at some of these ports of entry. Take the port of Chicago as an illustration. The maximum compensation of the collector of customs under existing law at Chicago is a salary of $1,000, with fees and commissions not to exceed in the aggregate $2,500 per annum; yet it turns out that at the port of Chicago the collector receives a sum largely beyond this. He has fees and commissions on the disbursements of money, &c., which go to swell this sum, but I think in some measure limited by the regulations of the Treasury Department.

So, take the surveyors acting as collectors at Saint Louis and Cincinnati. There are no collectors of customs at these two ports, but the surveyors of customs appointed under existing law perform the duties of collectors. They receive a salary of $350 per annum under the act of March 2, 1831, with fees and commissions not to exceed in all $3,000 per annum, by classing these surveyors with collectors, under the tenth section of the act of May 7, 1822. They are also entitled to storage, $2,000 per annum, under the act of March 3, 1841, third section, and the act of March 3, 1857, eighth section, and the act of July 18, 1866, fortieth section, making an annual compensation in all of $5,000.

So you see that at the various ports of entry which are classified under the general provision of the bill to which I have referred the sums are varying, and depend in many cases upon limitations on commissions or fees or otherwise, sums received for storage and commissions, and for other services, prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury or by special acts of Congress, and varying from $500 up to almost $7,000. In many cases they exhibit an entire disparity between the services performed and the compensation received. It is for the purpose of equalizing this class of compensations, not to exceed in any case the maximum sum now authorized or received under existing laws and regulations, that the general provision is introduced in the bill. It was deemed the best way under all the circumstances of arriving at a general regulation in respect to these outlying ports of entry.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if he means to say that the law fixes a compensation for the collector of customs at Chicago at one sum and that the actual sum paid to him is a greater one?

Mr. FENTON. The actual salary of the collector at the port of Chicago is $1,000 a year, and the sums that he receives beyond that arise from his commissions, from storage, from commissions on disbursements, and by a special act of Congress of 1841, allowing him $1,500 for additional services.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It seems, after all then, that what the honorable Senator from New York stated two or three minutes ago that the instance of Chicago was one where the officer was obtaining compensation in some form or other beyond what the law allowed is a mistake; that the law, if you put all the acts of Congress together, gives him what he receives. Therefore I take it we need not waste the time of the Senate in discussing that as being any abuse, unless the law itself may fix too great a compensation. The Secretary of the Treasury is not to blame for it, plainly; whereas in that very instance the Senator proposes to turn the collector of Chicago over to the Secretary of the Treasury to fix his compensation. If it be an abuse by being too great in point of law, now you say to the Secretary of the Treasury, "You may continue the abuse if you like. If you happen to be corrupt, if you happen to be a candidate for the Presidency, if you happen to be a strong partisan, then help your friends." That is not my idea of the civil-service reform. But I have already spent more time on this subject than I ought to have done perhaps.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The motion is to refer the bill to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits and amendatory of the acts in relation thereto, asked for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. H. C. BURCHARD of Illinois, Mr. J. A. KASSON of Iowa, and Mr. J. B. BECK of Kentucky, managers at the same on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 826) for the relief of Elias C. Boudinot;

A bill (H. R. No. 2191) in relation to customs duties on imported fruits;

A bill (H. R. No. 3085) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish copies of certain papers called for by resolution of the House;

A bill (H. R. No. 498) to settle the accounts of Captain A. B. Dyer; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3255) to establish an assay office at Helena, in the Territory of Montana.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BOREMAN. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 44, to establish the Territory of Pembina, and to provide a temporary government therefor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest, at the request of the Senator from Rhode Island, that we take up the Calendar of unobjected cases, so as to put through the poor little pension bills and all that class of cases. A want will be relieved, as in the Mississippi case, very largely by disposing of those bills upon the Calendar to which nobody has any objection and which are just in themselves and small in amount, and as to which poor people are waiting to have them disposed of. I ask, therefore, that we proceed to the Calendar of unobjected cases under what is known as the Anthony rule.

Mr. BOREMAN. This is the last bill that was called when we were upon the Calendar before, and some objection was then made to its consideration, and the suggestion made as it is now made that we proceed with the consideration of unobjected bills. I cannot see why a bill of this character should not be considered as well as those which appertain to individual interests. Here are eight or ten thousand people who are asking for a governmental organization. I do not mean to go into the merits of the bill now; but I think they have as much claim on the attention of the Senate as any single individual who may have a bill here.

I will say further that the Committee on Territories, while they have reported a few unimportant bills and have had them passed, have not claimed the consideration of the Senate for five minutes during this session. This bill has been reported for a month and a half, and I think it is one of those measures that should be considered. I do not think it will elicit much discussion. If I may be permitted to say so much, I will say that the provisions of the bill are those that are ordinarily incorporated in territorial bills; there is nothing extraordinary about it. I think the report made by the committee will satisfy the minds of Senators so that they can vote upon it. I shall not propose to discuss the merits of it unless there is some objection made to it upon some special ground. I therefore have made the motion that I have, and I hope that the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will only take a moment of the Senate's time. I think it obvious from the nature of the bill that the Senator proposes that it will lead to very considerable debate, not from me certainly, although I have a pretty decided opinion about it; but it ought to be considered by the Senate at large and in such a way that the attention of all Senators will be drawn to it. It proposes to establish, I believe, a territorial government out of what is now a part of the Territory of Dakota. That, of course, leads to all the questions of setting up a government there, the expense to the United States, the necessity for it, and ultimately of the admission of a State, the capacity of this colony to become a State from its situation and location and possibilities and probabilities—all of the questions which are among the gravest that we have in marking out these territorial divisions in the western country, which of course in the natural order of things will some time or other, if they do not die out, become States. Therefore I think that this is one of those cases where there would naturally be discussion and very considerable discussion; it might take to-day and to-morrow. I do not say it ought not to be considered; it ought, undoubtedly; but I do say in the interest of humanity and fairness to poor claimants who have not the power to lobby much for themselves, that where committees have examined their cases and reported and nobody objects to them, all being satisfied that they are right, we ought to give them the poor grace of getting their little pittances through. That is my only reason for opposing the taking up of this bill, which is certainly one worthy of consideration.

Mr. BOREMAN. I feel confident that when the Senator hears, if he has not read, the report made by the Committee on Territories, it will meet all the objections which he might urge to the establishment of this Territory. I do not propose to go into the merits of it, but it will be found, I think, entitled to more merit than any bill for the establishment of a territorial government which has been successful here for the last twenty years. I have had a map made of the country which shows everything about it. I have the statistics in regard to the population, the growth of towns, the railroads through it, and other matters, which can be laid before the Senate, and I think will be entirely satisfactory. I trust that the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill. I will only add that the bill was reported favorably by the same committee two years ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The question being put, a division was called for.

Mr. HAMLIN. Can we not cut this knot by going into executive session? I make that motion.

Mr. CONKLING. If we go into executive session, that does not leave this motion unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, a division was called for; which resulted—ayes 21, noes 14; no quorum voting.

Mr. MORTON. There is a quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If Senators will vote the Chair is of opinion that a quorum is present. The Chair will put the question again.

The question being again put, the motion was agreed to—the ayes being 27, and the noes 12.

EXPORTATION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits, and amendatory of the acts in relation thereto, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Messrs. WRIGHT, ANTHONY, and STOCKTON the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and thirty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 7, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXPORTATION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. BURCHARD. On behalf of the Committee on Ways and Means, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits, and amendatory of the acts in relation thereto, which has been returned from the Senate with amendments, be taken from the Speaker's table and the amendments non-concurred in.

The Clerk read the amendments of the Senate, as follows:

In lines 14, 15, and 16, of section 1, strike out the words:

By striking out of said section the word "twenty-five" before the word "cents," and inserting the word "ten" in lieu thereof.

In lines 42 and 43, after the words "if any," strike out the words "in excess of 2 per cent. of the number of gallons of spirits named in the entry of withdrawal;" so as to read:

Upon the receipt of the certificate and report, and upon payment of tax on deficiency, if any, the collector of internal revenue shall cancel the transportation bond.

Strike out the following words, commencing in line 45 of section 1:

And, further, that the allowance of 2 per cent. for deficiency shall apply to all transportation bonds now outstanding made previous to the passage of this act, in accordance with the regulations under the act of July 20, 1868, as amended by the act of June 6, 1872.

Strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us hear the bill read.

The Clerk read the bill. It proposes to further amend section 55 of the act of July 20, 1868, as amended by the act of June 6, 1872, and by the act of March 3, 1873, by striking out the words "such bonds," where they first occur in the section, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "a transportation bond;" by inserting in the second proviso of the section, after the word "given" and before the word "for," the words "to the collector of the port," and after the words "bill of lading" and before the word "or," the words "or any other port without the jurisdiction of the United States;" by striking out of the section the word "twenty-five" before the word "cents," and inserting the word "ten" in lieu thereof; by inserting after the word "practicable" the words "on arrival of the spirits at the port of export, the exporter or owner at that port shall immediately notify the collector of the port of the fact, setting forth his intention to export the same, and the name of the vessel upon which the same are to be laden, and the port to which they are intended to be exported. He shall, after the quantity of spirits has been determined by the gauger and inspector, file with the collector of the port an export entry and an affidavit. He shall also give bond to the United States, with at least two sureties, satisfactory to the collector of customs, conditioned that the principal named in said bond will export the spirits as specified in said entry to the port designated in said entry, or to any other port without the jurisdiction of the United States;" by inserting, after the words "upon which the tax has been paid," the words "and upon the lading of such spirits, the collector of the port, after proper bonds for the exportation of the same have been completed by the exporter or owner at the port of shipment thereof, shall transmit to the collector of internal revenue of the district from which the said spirits were withdrawn for exportation, a clearance certificate and a detailed report of the gauger, which report shall show the capacity of each cask in wine gallons and the contents thereof in wine gallons, proof gallons, and taxable gallons. Upon the receipt of the certificate and report, and upon payment of tax on deficiency, if any, in excess of 2 per cent. of the number of gallons of spirits named in the entry of withdrawal, the collecter of internal revenue shall cancel the transportation bond; and, further, that the allowance of 2 per cent. for deficiency shall apply to all transportation bonds now outstanding made previous to the passage of the act, in accordance with the regulations under the act of July 20, 1868, as amended by the act of June 6, 1872."

The second section proposes to amend section 1 of the act of May 27, 1872, by inserting after the words "United States," in the first paragraph of said section, the words "or in transit in bond for export;" and after the word "warehouse," the third time it occurs, and before the word "bond" the words "or transportation."

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to listen to an explanation of the effect of the bill and the amendments, if I may have the privilege subsequent to that explanation of objecting.

Mr. BURCHARD. Of objecting to what?

Mr. RANDALL. To taking up the bill. I am not willing that the bill should be sent to a conference committee of six men without our knowing anything about it.

Mr. BURCHARD. The House bill provides for the taking up of the exportation bond given at the point of shipment in the interior and substituting for it an exportation bond at the port of shipping. It also provides for a reduction of the export stamp upon the distilled spirits from twenty-five cents to ten cents. The Senate has agreed to the first provision. They have stricken out the provision which reduced the exportation stamp from twenty-five cents to ten cents. The House bill allowed a percentage in cases of difference upon the regauging of the spirits at the port of shipment. The Senate has stricken out that provision, and it is desirable that the subject should be sent to a committee of conference, where it may be further considered. There should be some allowance made, whether it be the amount provided for in the bill or not. Therefore I desire to move a non-concurrence in the amendments of the Senate and that a committee of conference be requested.

The whole matter will come before the House when the report of the committee of conference is made, and the gentlemen will have an opportunity to present their objections. If any action is taken it should be taken at once.

Mr. RANDALL. With this explanation I do not desire to insist upon my objection.

No further objection being made, the amendments were taken up and non-concurred in, a committee of conference was requested, and Mr. BURCHARD, Mr. KASSON, and Mr. BECK appointed as the conferees on the part of the House.

DES MOINES RIVER GRANT.

Mr. ORR. I ask unanimous consent of the House that the bill (H. R. No. 1142) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to indemnify the holders of pre-emption and homestead certificates and certificates of entry and patents upon lands in Iowa within the so-called Des Moines River grant on account of failure of titles, and to procure the relinquishment of the permanent titles to the United States, be made a special order for consideration in the House after one o'clock on next Thursday.

The SPEAKER. To be confined to that day?

Mr. ORR. I would not like to confine it to that day, although I think it will not take much time to dispose of it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I will not object if it is made a special order for consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ORR. Very well; I will modify my proposition in that respect.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Reports from the Committee on Ways and Means and the Committee on Appropriations excepted.

Mr. ORR. I do not object to that.

The proposition, as modified, was then agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

Mr. KASSON submitted the following; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That the one hundred and sixth rule of the House be amended by adding thereto the following:

But if it be reported to the House that upon such call of the roll a quorum has answered to their names, the House shall again go into Committee of the Whole and may proceed with the consideration of the pending bill in committee, although a quorum will not be found by tellers on subsequent votes during the same session of the committee.

MARY E. MELINE.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3264) granting a pension to Mary E. Meline, widow of James F. Meline; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LAND-LOCKED OR RAIFORD WATER-ROUTE.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Commerce joint resolution (H. R. No. 82) authorizing and requiring the Secretary of War to have a survey made over what is known as the land-locked or Raiford water-route; and the same was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. KELLEY. I move that the rules be suspended and the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the centennial bill. Permit me, in pursuance of what was said yesterday, to say that it would be agreeable to me to move that in going into Committee of the Whole it be for the purpose of rising and reporting the bill to the House for action. I have heard several gentlemen around me express a desire to make brief speeches before debate shall be closed. I will therefore submit to the House this proposition: that we go into Committee of the Whole with the understanding that at two o'clock (that will give two hours and a half for debate) the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House, and that the main question shall then be considered as ordered thereon. That would give me the right to make the closing argument; but I am utterly unable physically to occupy the floor for the time to which I would be entitled, even without any effort at speaking. I shall ask, therefore, that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] who is on the Centennial Committee, and who is chairman of the centennial commission, may occupy my time. And I also ask the House to accord to him as much time for the bill as was occupied against it by my friend from Maine, [Mr. HALE;] that is, not exceeding an hour and a half.

Mr. DAWES. Not to be farmed out by him to others.

Mr. KELLEY. No; only so much time as he may want to occupy himself, not to exceed one hour and a half.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The proposition of the gentleman, as I understand it, if accepted, would give for debate two hours and a half, of which he asks that an hour and a half at the close may be given to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir; but that when the bill shall be reported to the House the gentleman from Connecticut shall close the debate.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That will give two hours and a half for general debate in which different members can participate, and then on the bill being nominally reported to the House, without any recommendation from the committee. I presume the gentleman does not want that.

Mr. KELLEY. With the understanding that the main question shall be ordered.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. So that it shall come up for a vote.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. For one, (I do not claim to speak for any one else than myself,) I do not see any objection to that proposition as a matter of fairness. The bill will come before the House for a direct vote at once upon the subject-matter, where the yeas and nays can be called, as they undoubtedly will be.

Mr. GARFIELD. The bill in its present shape?

Mr. KELLEY. In its present shape.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let debate in Committee of the Whole be limited to ten or fifteen minute speeches.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let it be embodied in the proposition that the vote shall be taken at half-past three o'clock.

Mr. GARFIELD. Or as much sooner as the gentleman from Connecticut may get through.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] may get through earlier than half-past two. Mr. Speaker, I am asked to make a suggestion for the limitation of debate. I would gladly do it; but several of the gentlemen whose names are on the list of speakers are adverse to the position I take on this question, and I do not desire to restrict them. I would be glad, however, if consent should be given that no gentleman shall speak over thirty minutes, and that there shall be no extension of time under any circumstances.

Mr. GARFIELD. I venture to suggest fifteen minutes as the limit.

Mr. DAWES. Say twenty minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, twenty minutes. By this arrangement we shall accommodate many more gentlemen than by adhering to the hour rule.

Mr. KELLEY. If the House accepts the limitation of twenty minutes I shall be very glad.

Mr. BECK. I wish to object to the first part of the arrangement, which proposes that the gentleman from Connecticut be allowed one hour and a half. I object to any gentleman speaking over one hour.

Mr. RANDALL. The unfairness of that proposition is that the leading opponent of the bill, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] was allowed an hour and a half.

Mr. BECK. It never ought to have been granted.

Mr. GARFIELD. As there has been one extension on the other side, I hope the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] will withdraw his objection.

Mr. KELLEY. In view of the fact that the time of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] was extended, I hope my friend from Kentucky will consent to this arrangement.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. As, through the courtesy of the House at the suggestion of gentlemen in favor of the bill, I was allowed to speak in opposition to it for an hour and a half, I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will not object to giving the gentleman from Connecticut the same time. I think that would be fair.

Mr. GARFIELD. And let the speeches in Committee of the Whole be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. BECK. Well, I withdraw the objection now, and content myself with giving notice that I shall hereafter object to speeches of more than an hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no further objection to the arrangement allowing to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] one hour and a half. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] asks unanimous consent that speeches in the Committee of the Whole on this bill shall be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Does this arrangement fix definitely the time when the vote shall be taken?

The SPEAKER. It does. Unless the House by unanimous consent shall hereafter make another arrangement, the vote must be taken at half-past three o'clock to-day. The Chair hears no objection to the arrangement suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the order is accordingly made. This order suggests to the Chair the remark that he hopes the limitation as to the time of speaking will not be extended in Committee of the Whole. The committee has in fact no authority whatever to grant such extensions of time; and the chairman of the committee has no right to entertain a motion to extend the time beyond what the House orders.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move to reconsider the vote by which the proposition was adopted; and move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELLEY. I now move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2986) to appropriate $3,000,000 in aid of the centennial celebration and international exhibition of 1876.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair takes occasion to remark that when any gentleman shall have spoken twenty minutes there can be absolutely no extension, such being the order of the House.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have not sought the floor upon this occasion for the purpose of opposing the proposition that an exhibition shall be held at the city of Philadelphia in 1876, or to express the opinion that the people of the United States ought not in some suitable way to signalize the Declaration of Independence of this nation when the centennial year shall arrive. Nor do I desire to make any factious or unreasonable opposition to the bill which is now pending and under discussion. My purpose is rather to seek to avail myself of this occasion to enter my protest against the class of legislation to which this belongs, and to emphasize, so far as I am able to do, objections which I have heretofore entered against a species of legislation, of which this is only one instance, by which the Government is involuntarily involved in the meshes of implied and so-called moral obligations, even in the face and in the teeth of express stipulations of law to the contrary.

I voted for the bill which authorizes the proposed exhibition at Philadelphia. When it was proposed to strike out the city of Philadelphia and to put other cities in its place I voted uniformly in favor of allowing the exhibition or exposition (whatever you may term it) to be held at the city of Philadelphia, believing, in view of the fact that the Declaration of Independence was first promulgated in that city, that that was the appropriate place for such a celebration or such an exposition if any was to be held anywhere in the country. I am not actuated, therefore, by any feeling against the city of Philadelphia. On the contrary, all my predilections are in favor of the city of Philadelphia; and I was exceedingly gratified not only with the public spirit but with the patriotism which was displayed by that great city and by the State of Pennsylvania, of which it is the commercial metropolis, when they proposed at their own expense, or at least without any expense to the General Government, that they would hold an exposition of the kind proposed, and thus do what I regarded as an exceedingly appropriate thing to be done by the people of Pennsylvania with the voluntary assistance of citizens of all the other States and Territories.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is not the only time we have been taken by surprise by such a demand for money when none was promised. I beg, as preliminary to what I may say about the measure itself, to refer very briefly to what we did in regard to the Vienna exposition held last year, at which the United States were represented, and out of which so much shame, mortification, and regret resulted to the people of the United States.

When it was first proposed, Mr. Chairman, that we should send a commission to Vienna it was brought forward in the same modest way that the proposition for the centennial exhibition in this country was introduced by a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania. I ask the Clerk to read what was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Banks, then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, at the time he reported a joint resolution providing this country should be represented at Vienna.

The Clerk read as follows:

VIENNA INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. BANKS also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2800) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint one or more commissioners to represent the Government of the United States at the international exposition of agriculture, industry, and fine arts, to be held at Vienna in 1873, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the President of the United States be, and he thereby is, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one or more agents to represent the Government of the United States at the international exposition of agriculture, industry, and fine arts, to be held at Vienna in 1873, provided that such appointments shall not impose on this Government any liability for the expense which they may occasion.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana whether at a subsequent session of Congress we did not appropriate $200,000 to cover the expenses of the representation of the United States at the Vienna exposition?

Mr. NIBLACK. That is exactly what I am coming to; and I wish, so far as I am concerned, as one member of this House to set the seal of reprobation upon this kind of legislation by which we are first assured the Government will be charged nothing at all, and afterward an appropriation is brought forward upon the ground that we are under moral obligations to pay the money.

Mr. RANDALL. But that dismisses in great measure the constitutional objection.

Mr. NIBLACK. I do not propose to go into any discussion of the constitutional question now.

It was urged privately, Mr. Chairman, at that time, and I am not quite sure that it was not also urged in the debate in this House, or at the other end of the Capitol, that a great number of gentlemen were not only willing but anxious to go abroad at their own expense to represent the Government of the United States at Vienna because of the social position it would give them, and who would not therefore ask the Government to pay them anything in the way of salary or other compensation; that all it would be necessary to do would be only to procure the proper legislation to allow that to be done, to give them some official position. However, the very next year the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Banks) reported to the House from the Committee on Foreign Affairs a bill to appropriate $100,000 for the expense of that commission. I ask the Clerk to read what the gentleman from Massachusetts at the next session of Congress reported, in the face of the bill reported by him the year before, and which was passed into law by both Houses with an additional $100,000 added.

The Clerk read as follows:

VIENNA INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. BANKS also reported, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, a joint resolution (H. R. No. 170) to enable the people of the United States to participate in the advantages of the international exposition to be held at Vienna in 1873; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. BANKS. I ask that this resolution be read at length. It contains an appropriation, and will go to the Committee of the Whole if objection should be made.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that in order to enable the people of the United States to participate in the advantages of the international exposition of the products of agriculture, manufactures, and fine arts, to be held at Vienna in 1873, there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purposes therein specified, which sum is to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State. The second section provides that the governors of the several States be requested to invite the patriotic people of their respective States to assist in the proper representation of the handiwork of our artisans, and the prolific sources of material wealth with which our land is blessed, and to take such further measures as may be necessary to diffuse a knowledge of the proposed exhibition, and to secure to their respective States the advantages which it promises. The third section makes it the duty of the Secretary of State to transmit to Congress a detailed statement of the expenditures which may be incurred under the provisions of the act.

Mr. NIBLACK. I opposed that bill for the very same reasons I now oppose the present proposed appropriation to the centennial exposition, and if I remember correctly I was assisted and supported in that opposition heartily by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. I am always for giving to my own country as against giving to foreign kingdoms.

Mr. NIBLACK. I think the gentleman was right then, and I have a strong impression he would be right now if he could divest himself of the home influences which unfortunately more or less control the most of us too frequently.

But, Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked on page 254 of the same volume. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who was then as now chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, felt called upon to enter his protest against this class of legislation, and expressed himself very vigorously and very ably in some remarks, a portion of which I now ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the last day of the last session of Congress a resolution of about eight lines was passed authorizing the President to appoint one or more gentlemen to attend this Vienna exhibition, and now I read the last line, "provided that such appointment shall not impose upon this Government any liability for the expenses which they may incur." Now, anybody knows that a little bill of seven or eight lines, which permits the President to appoint one or more persons to attend this exposition in a sort of official or semi-official capacity, without pay and without expense to the Government—such a bill as that will encounter very little opposition in this House. That little bill having been passed, the President having appointed those who were willing to go abroad for the honor of it, one perhaps who would go any way, we are now called upon to say that we ought not to send people abroad at their own expense, that they ought not to be called upon to go abroad unless they are backed up with money enough to make the whole thing creditable to this country.

Now, that is right, and I am in favor of a reasonable appropriation. But I do insist that this House should not be taken by surprise in this method of legislation. This is not less than the third or fourth instance of this sort that has come to the Committee on Appropriations within the past few days. The measures got through without debate, because they appeared to authorize and did authorize no expenditures; but they finally involved us in a sort of moral obligation to make an appropriation.

Mr. NIBLACK. Notwithstanding the objections of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, supported as he was, I think, by the entire committee, certainly by a large majority of it, the bill passed and went to the Senate, and there it was amended by fixing the amount at $300,000. It was returned to the House with the amendment; and I believe by a committee of conference, or by some other conference between persons in charge of the bill, the amount of $200,000 was agreed upon in addition to facilities afforded in the way of transportation of goods by the Navy, amounting to $200,000 more.

I would not have regretted this expenditure so much if good results had followed it. But in view of the deplorable events which occurred at the city of Vienna last year, in the part which our country sustained there, we cannot any of us, I think, look back to it except with feelings of the deepest mortification. But the only object I have in referring to the proceedings in regard to the Vienna exposition is to demonstrate that the practice is springing up in this country of bringing forward schemes in this modest way, the parties pledging themselves not to charge the Government anything, asking only to be allowed to do something under the auspices of the General Government with the prestige of nationality about it, and then following it up some subsequent session with a proposition to throw a part if not the whole expense upon the Government, and insisting, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] did the other day, that we are under a moral and almost a legal obligation to take upon ourselves the expenditures involved in this measure.

This objection of mine, sir, is general in its character and applies to all such schemes alike. I try to favor fair-dealing everywhere, and I want it especially in matters of legislation where all are interested alike. It seems now to be understood by shrewd gentlemen that if they can once get the national Government to authorize anything, no matter how expensive it may prove, no matter what pledges may have been given that nothing should be required of the General Government, it yet follows as a matter of course that the Government is pledged to pay all the bills. Therefore, as I said at the outset of my remarks, I have sought this occasion more particularly to protest against that bad method of legislation than to oppose this measure itself.

The bill authorizing the proposed celebration was introduced by one of the Representatives from Pennsylvania, no longer a member of this House, Mr. Morrell. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from his speech, from which it will appear that the original proposition was that nothing should be expended by the General Government beyond the traveling expenses of the commission. And afterward it was provided in the law itself that there should be no charge whatever against the General Government.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MORRELL, of Pennsylvania. I am instructed by the Committee on Manufactures to report back to the House, and ask that it be considered at the present time, unless the House is willing to grant a postponement until a day fixed, the bill (H. R., No. 1478) to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of American independence, by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, in the city of Philadelphia, and State of Pennsylvania, in the year 1876, with amendments in the nature of a substitute. I ask that the consideration of this bill be postponed until the fourth Thursday of January next, and that an order be made absolutely fixing its consideration for that day. * * * * * * *

If it were not necessary, in order to give to the celebration and exhibition an international as well as a national character, that Congress should sanction and inaugurate the project, the local authorities of Pennsylvania and Philadelphia would assume their sole direction. If Congress shall desire to take such action as is contemplated in the proposed legislation, I am authorized to say that Philadelphia and Pennsylvania will give the use of Fairmount Park, erect buildings, and make all necessary arrangements for the exhibition free of expense to the Government.

Mr. NIBLACK. I now ask the Clerk to read the passage marked on page 108, from the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] on that occasion.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is stipulated that these commissioners shall receive no compensation for their services; the Government is only to pay their actual expenses. These objections have no force whatever. All we ask is that the sanction and superintending aid of the Government shall be lent to a celebration the fitness of which no one will deny, an international exhibition which shall be regarded in the future as a great national event, and which would fail to mark the historic period it is designed to recall if placed in any other spot than where liberty was first proclaimed throughout the land and to all the inhabitants thereof.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have other extracts I desired to have read to show how utterly mistaken gentlemen are when they assert that we are under any obligations, legal or moral, to meet the expenses of this centennial, but my time will not permit. I intended also to speak of the manifest impropriety of assuming the expenditure of any large sum of money at this time which the public service does not absolutely require; but that is not now permitted for the same reason.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CROCKER. Mr. Chairman, I have very grave doubts whether I will be able to occupy the floor long, and if not, I shall throw myself upon the courtesy and kindness of the House for leave to print what I would say. I have but just emerged from an attack of pneumonia and fever, and my voice is anything but what it ordinarily is; and a good many other gentlemen here will soon be in the same condition, if we continue pursuing the same course we have heretofore—sitting here in a room that has none of the air of heaven in it at all, except that which is pumped up in an artificial way from underneath.

Sir, before I come particularly to the points I propose to make, let me say that some few weeks ago I said something upon this matter of this exposition. It was said on the spur of the moment, but I said it with all the reluctance of a man borne down as I was, and as I believe every member of this House is, with a knowledge of the paucity of our means and of the want of everything that belongs to a nation so prosperous as we are—I said then that I should be willing, and I say now that I am willing and ready, to vote for a reasonable appropriation for this international exposition. I did it then, sir, under a pressure, and what was that pressure? I have witnessed the effect of these gatherings here, on a small scale, and I have witnessed the effect of them on a larger scale when abroad. I have seen in the mother-country, Mr. Chairman, the great gatherings of her people at turf meetings and at agricultural exhibitions and other occasions, and in 1871 I saw the gathering of the whole wealth of that wonderful island in the Crystal Palace in London. Sir, there was collected together there stock, manufactures, productions of every kind from England, Scotland, and Ireland—no; I beg pardon; from England, Scotland, and Wales. Ireland being little else than a stock-raising and agricultural country, which sells its products at cost, and buys principally its fabrics for use at 50 per cent. profit, had but little in its poverty to send to that exposition. Their meetings of the turf, their agricultural shows and other gatherings, not only make them a homogeneous people, but completely nationalize them. When I witnessed these spectacles, visiting them frequently and examining them in all their various departments, I realized the immense wealth of that little island, England and Wales, together not making quite fifty thousand square miles. During my visits to England I saw the effect and influence of these great national gatherings. To sum it up in a sentence in prose, as expressed in a song which I heard among the lowly—"Old England, with all your taxation, we love thee still; we love our noble Queen, the personification of dignity to her sex and honor to humanity." Such a people, such a nationality, can never be conquered, and the flag of the Cross of Saint George can never quail or lose its power. Sir, I could not but feel and say, "Would that we could have a national exposition and bring the people of this great continent, of this great Republic, from Maine to the Rio Grande, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, once, at least, together."

To return, this animus impelled me to a reasonable appropriation, and I say now, as I have said before, it is false economy to withhold it.

Nobody regrets our shortcomings more than I do. Sir, we put the knife in too deep during the last session in retrenching customs and internal revenues, so that we cannot even provide for a sinking fund, much less can we pay for anything of this kind. But, sir, if those with whom I act upon this floor have courage enough, we will put on additional taxes sufficient to make ourselves right and not mortify the nation's pride by showing the white feather in relation to this matter of celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of our Government. We have meddled with State rights where there was no exigency; ay, sir, we have even interfered with individual rights, and undertaken to fix the hours of labor, as if I, a laboring man, am to be told how many hours I may work. Sir, I have always worked ten, twelve, or fourteen hours a day, and whatever God has given me has come by hard work; but here under the Government a man is only required to work eight hours a day, or if he works more than that his pay is increased in proportion. There is not a ship-builder in this country who cannot build ships cheaper than the Government. We have in consequence emasculated our navy-yards by making eight hours a day's work; and as the able chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means said, had better begin to sell them, as private yards do not work less than ten hours per day. And so with our printing office; the work done in that office cost us nearly two dollars last year where it ought to have cost one dollar.

Another source of our national poverty, so that we cannot do what the nation's pride demands, is demoralization. What customs we do collect are not half done. We give spies and informers half they can collect and worm out of some timid merchant, who, rather than lose all his books and, as he foolishly supposes, his character, compounds; while the internal revenue officers, some of them at least, sit in their easy chairs and let the harpies of greed and plunder do their sworn duties at the halves. No wonder, sir, that we are poor and cannot meet a national want; and until reforms are instituted (and I give to the Committee on Ways and Means credit for their efforts) we must be poor indeed.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I repeat what I have once said on the impulse of the moment, that the day itself committed every American heart, and that our friends coming from the other continent to this exposition and comparing what we have accomplished in one century against the ages of their existence, in leveling forests and building cities and railroads, their progress would seem small and diminutive to them as compared with ours under the influence of our free institutions.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not advocate this exposition on account of those who may visit us from other countries of whatever class. They will all receive a warm welcome and every attention that is due to them. We never fail in this respect; but I advocate it and the appropriation on the ground of its beneficent influences upon ourselves, bringing our great family together from all parts of the country. How rapidly this will be accomplished by steam and the iron rail we all know. There we shall meet and compare views, wear off prejudices, contract friendships which will continue until we reach that narrow house which is the last of earth. Yet I am not indifferent or oblivious to other countries and peoples who will come here to examine into our internal policy, modes of thought, progress in science and education, the arts and mechanics. No, sir; I hereby acknowledge our debt to the German, Scandinavian, and other bloods, who have made some of our best citizens. God bless them! let such come over now and see their kindred. Nor am I anxious that they should ever go back again.

I look at this as an occasion when we shall not only come together and know ourselves, but know how much we depend upon each other; know what the East owes the South and West, and what, if anything, is due to us in return. Let us see the best specimens of production, the cotton, rice, sugar, &c., of the South. Ay, sir, and we will hail the production of any fabric they shall exhibit as a promise of future success in the same. We will also see the great West there, with all its cereals and manufactures, increasing every day in all the pride of Berkeley's prophecy, "Westward the star of empire takes its way," sure to come, when the East will be small, attenuated points in the galaxy of stars against their broad acres. I wish to see the people of this country gathered together on an occasion which will make one heart of us all—a great national throb and pulsation. I wish to see them gathered together at Philadelphia in old Independence Hall with its cracked bell. I want to go there, if my life is spared, as one John Hancock and one John Adams went a hundred years before. I said the other day, and I say now, that Massachusetts wants to be there, and I venture to promise that Massachusetts will be there. I wish to see our young and noble sister States of California, Nevada, and those States in prospect, Colorado and Utah, represented there with their untold and increasing agricultural products; it will be some satisfaction to gaze upon their specimens of gold and silver, so much wanted now and which we cannot obtain for anything we have, it being sent to the mint in England to be coined for nothing, (while here it costs one-fifth of 1 per cent.,) and somehow we never get it back again. I want to see these specimens, if for nothing else on earth than to gaze on something that looks like hard money.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CROCKER. That cannot be; I have twenty minutes, and I certainly have not spoken over ten minutes.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. I think the Chair has made a mistake of ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is guided by the dial.

Mr. CROCKER. May I go on?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes more.

Mr. CROCKER. Very well; I must take what the Chairman sees fit to give me, but I have spoken only ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has spoken a little over fifteen minutes.

Mr. CROCKER. Very well. A word on finance, as to what we shall give. I accept the bill as it stands, although I could wish a less sum might be sufficient. I am willing to be taxed for it twice my proportion rather than the tender pride of this noble country should be wounded. This is a national matter.

I leave the guarded message of our worthy President, the circulars of Mr. Secretary Fish, whether guarded or unguarded, and say here and now that, when a proud nation through her proper authority, the executive, says anything by way of commendation of an exposition, it cannot resort to dereliction or subterfuge; and this is the impelling motive of the vote I shall cast to-day.

And now a word about the president and treasurer of the centennial committee selected to disburse any moneys which Congress or any individual or corporation may put into their hands. They are an honor to the city of Philadelphia. Sir, allow me to say you will have no defalcations there; none of those robberies and stealings which have made our ears sting and tingle for the past few years. Every dollar will be vouched, and every cent too, passing through their hands. There are, thank God, some in our country that we can turn to yet as His "noblest work."

There has been a great deal said here about sentimentality. I have a word to say upon that subject. I remember when a boy that that noble galaxy of stars [pointing to the flag over the Speaker's chair] was thought something of. We did not call it sentimentality or anything of that kind when old Commodore Hull with the Constitution took the Guerriere, the Java, the Cyane, and the Levant; when the frigate United States took the Macedonian, the Wasp took the Frolic, and the Hornet the Penguin; when Commodore Perry won the victory on Lake Erie, and Commodore McDonough on Lake Champlain; when the noble Scott, at Lundy's Lane, said, "Boys, stand by your flag and your guns;" when all these things took place, there was the flag which they looked upon every day and every hour and every minute. I do not wonder that some people think it is a sentimentality, by our suicidal course, from the fact that all the foreign carrying trade now goes almost entirely to other nations, and the noble emblem of the Stars and Stripes is seldom seen on the Atlantic Ocean. I do not wonder they begin to think it is a myth. But I do not believe it—not I; nor did old Farragut think so when he nailed it to his mast. Nor did the poor wounded fellow whom I took care of after the battle of Antietam, with four shots through him, who had held the colors of the Massachusetts Thirteenth. In his dying hour he said, "Mr. CROCKER, let me see my mother, and let me take hold of that old flag which I rushed ahead with in my hands in order to keep my regiment from breaking before the brave confederates, for they fought as well as we; let me take hold of it once more, and then let me die." That a sentimentality? Pride of country a sentimentality? God forgive anybody that makes it anything like a mere sentimentality. I tell you it is reality.

Sir, I must now close, keeping in view the great national object of this exposition, fraternity, unity. If we would keep ourselves one people, one body-politic, we must know each other better. The stars upon our proud emblem will always shed an undivided, ay, an undiminished, luster if we are only true to each other. Let us stand by that emblem and by each other, scorning every doubt and all treason, protecting the rights of our humblest citizen, and with God Almighty as our protector and guardian we will pale in glory all and every other flag of time.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Several MEMBERS. "Go on."

Mr. CROCKER. Mr. Chairman, cannot I be allowed a few minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no power to entertain a motion for an extension of time. The order of the House is peremptory on the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I expect to give my vote against the bill now pending; and I desire to offer very briefly a few reasons for the vote which I shall give. I may as well say at the outset that there is very little temptation and very little encouragement to argue against "Glory hallelujah," especially when it is accompanied with "E pluribus unum" and "Yankee Doodle," and all these mounted upon the American eagle, which floats so high above the heads of all of us.

Nearly every gentleman who has spoken here in favor of the bill has based his argument upon the idea that the faith of the Government is plighted to this measure, and that no man can fail to vote for it without violating that plighted faith and subjecting the Government to dishonor and disgrace. If that is so, Mr. Chairman, the question is plain and simple; for where the plighted faith of the Government is given, or where the honor of the country is at stake, but one course is open to us.

These gentlemen base their argument of plighted faith upon two grounds. First, the action of Congress; and, second, the action of the Executive. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] went over the act of 1871 the other day, selecting from it various phrases to convince the committee that the Government had committed itself to the action contemplated by the present bill by reason of certain phrases and clauses used in that act; such as that it was under the auspices of the Government; such as that the President should appoint the commissioners; such as that these commissioners should report to Congress. But, Mr. Chairman, all those words, all those clauses, all those sentences, are to be construed in view of the express provision in each of these statutes that the credit of the Government was not in any event to be pledged for a dollar of money for this enterprise.

But, Mr. Chairman, I hardly see how any gentleman who has examined the history of this enterprise can say that the Government has pledged itself by those two statutes to furnish money for this celebration. What is the history of this transaction? In December, 1870, Mr. Morrell, then a Representative from Pennsylvania, presented in this House a bill which as subsequently amended is the act of 1871. Upon what ground did he ask that this celebration should take place in Philadelphia? Was Pennsylvania the only State, was Philadelphia the only city, asking that the celebration might take place in its midst? No, sir; New York was here—here before Pennsylvania, before Philadelphia; and the great question with the House then was what city should have the honor of this celebration, not what city should be entitled to demand aid for this purpose from the Government. New York in ten minutes subscribed $5,000,000 for having the enterprise in that city; and Mr. Morrell conceded that there were all over the country great cities claiming the honor of this enterprise. He named a great many of them. He mentioned New York as the great metropolis of the country and the great mart of the trade of the world. He mentioned Boston, also, as the capital of New England, the seat of learning, the Athens of America. He mentioned Pittsburgh as the Sheffield of America. He mentioned Baltimore, the beautiful Monumental City. He mentioned Saint Louis as the capital of the great valley of the West. He mentioned Cincinnati as the Queen City of the West. He also mentioned, if I remember rightly, Chicago, which he said had risen as if by magic, rivaling by the rapidity of its growth the fabled story of the Arabian Nights' Entertainments. The great question was, what city should have the honor of this enterprise?

It has been said by gentleman on this floor that nobody pledged or nobody had the right to pledge to Congress that the city of Philadelphia or the State of Pennsylvania would pay the expenses of this enterprise. Allow me to refer gentlemen to the speech of Mr. Morrell, (I will not stop now to read it,) wherein he said that he was authorized, authorized by the city of Philadelphia and by the State of Pennsylvania, to pledge to Congress that if that bill passed they would pay the expenses. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] then as now a member of the House, said that the matter of expense was of no importance; that if the measure passed, the city of Philadelphia or her citizens would provide the necessary funds, as any other great city of the country would do.

But the great point made in favor of Philadelphia was that the historic memories clustering around that city pointed to it as the only proper spot on the face of the earth for holding this celebration; it was upon that ground, and that ground only, that the celebration there was authorized.

This bill as originally presented did not provide that the expenses of the celebration should be paid by the Government; but, as presented, it was plain and clear that the Government would be liable for the expenses of the commissioners. Mr. SARGENT, of California, then a Representative, proposed to change that; and the change was made, with the assent of Mr. Morrell, so as to provide that the Government should not be liable for any of the expenses of the commissioners. In that shape the bill went from this House to the Senate, everybody agreeing, everybody understanding, that Congress or the Government was not to be liable for any expenses whatever.

In the Senate the bill was so amended as to provide no credit of the Government by anybody should be pledged to this enterprise; and so the bill passed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, why did they have this clause in it: "Under the auspices of the Government," and that the President should appoint commissioners, and those commissioners should report to Congress? To give it a character as Senator CAMERON said; to give it a character, Representative Morrell said. To give it a national character, so it might draw here people from all the nations of the earth. That was the only purpose of it.

Notwithstanding this express provision of the bill, gentlemen say the President bound us to this enterprise by his own action. Does anybody suppose the President has gone beyond the letter of the law, especially when he himself disclaims the right to do so? I beg leave to have the proclamation of the President and the letter of the Secretary of State incorporated in my remarks; I will not stop to have them read now:

Whereas by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, providing for a national celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the independence of the United States, by the holding of an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, in the city of Philadelphia, in the year 1876, it is provided as follows: "That whenever the President shall be informed by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that provision has been made for the erection of suitable buildings for the purpose, and for the exclusive control by the commission herein provided for of the proposed exhibition, the President shall, through the Department of State, make proclamation of the same, setting forth the time at which the exhibition will open and the place at which it will be held; and he shall communicate to the diplomatic representatives of all nations copies of the same, together with such regulations as may be adopted by the commissioners, for publication in their respective countries;" and whereas his excellency the governor of the State of Pennsylvania did, on the 24th day of June, 1873, inform me that provision has been made for the erection of said buildings and for the exclusive control by the commission provided for in the said act of the proposed exhibition; and whereas the president of the United States centennial commission has officially informed me of the dates fixed for the opening and closing of the said exhibition, and the place at which it is to be held:

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Ulysses S. Grant, President of the United States, in conformity with the provisions of the act of Congress aforesaid, do hereby declare and proclaim, that there will be held at the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and products of the soil and mine, to be opened on the 19th day of April, A. D. 1876, and to be closed on the 19th day of October, in the same year.

And in the interest of peace, civilization, and domestic and international friendship and intercourse, I commend the celebration and exhibition to the people of the United States; and, in behalf of this Government and people, I cordially commend them to all nations who may be pleased to take part therein.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 3d day of July, 1873, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-seventh.

[SEAL.] U. S. GRANT.

By the President:
HAMILTON FISH, Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 14, 1873.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant, in which you recall the attention of this Department to the suggestion contained in your letter of the 20th ultimo, that a general instruction might be addressed to the ministers of the United States abroad, and in countries where we have no diplomatic agents to the proper consular officers, directing them to urge upon the governments to which they are accredited the early appointment of commissioners or agents, if not already appointed, to enter into correspondence with the commission, and that information be sought through the same channels as to the approximate estimate of space in the industrial and fine-art departments of the exhibition which each government will probably require.

In reply I have to state that while the President feels a deep and sincere interest in the success of the exhibition, and Congress has given to it the sanction of its approval of its object and design, he has not been authorized by Congress to extend any invitation on behalf of the Government to foreign powers to participate in the exhibition. He was only authorized by the act of March 3, 1871, to issue a proclamation setting forth the time at which the exhibition will open and the place at which it will be held, and to communicate to the diplomatic representatives of all nations copies of the same, together with such regulations as may be adopted by the commissioners for publication in their respective countries. The President issued his proclamation on the 3d of July last, and copies of it and of the regulations referred to were communicated to the representatives of foreign powers accredited to this Government, with a note commending the exhibition to all nations who may be pleased to take part therein. Copies of these were also forwarded to the diplomatic representatives of this Government abroad.

Neither the act creating the commission, nor that incorporating the board of finance, authorizes any invitation in the name or on behalf of the Government to be extended to foreign powers, but only the announcement which was directed to be given, and has been given, to the representatives of those powers at this capital.

* * * * * * *

Should it be the desire of the commission to have another instruction prepared and forwarded to the diplomatic and consular officers of this Government, requesting them to use, unofficially, their good offices with a view to inducing foreign governments to participate in the exhibition, the Department will cause such instruction to be issued.

I take this opportunity to again assure the commission that both the President and this Department feel a lively interest in the success of the proposed celebration and exhibition to be held in commemoration of the anniversary of American independence and will extend all the aid to the commission which properly can be extended toward enlisting the sympathy and co-operation of foreign powers for the fulfillment of that object.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH.

A. T. GOSHORN, Esq., &c., Philadelphia, Pa.

Everybody agreed, Mr. Chairman, on the 22d of January last, everybody agreed on this floor then that the President had not committed anybody to this enterprise. When the bill was introduced and discussed here on the 22d of January last to give the President authority to "invite," the ground then was taken that he had disclaimed all right to bind anybody to furnish money for this fair by giving invitations to attend it. What was asked then? That he might have authority to invite the different governments of the world to come and join us in this transaction. He had not even done so. He had merely issued his proclamation of the time and place when and where this great show would be held, and nothing more than that. That was all he was authorized to do and all he has done.

I should like gentlemen from Pennsylvania to tell us on what authority the President issued that proclamation. He was not to do it until he was assured that Pennsylvania had made provision for the buildings which have not yet been erected. It must have been upon assurance given to the President of the United States that provision for these buildings had been made. Until that had been done, certainly he could not have issued that proclamation.

Up to the 22d of January nobody pretended that the President of the United States had committed us to this line of policy. Further than that, sir, it was expressly disavowed then upon this floor that any such measure could lead to any such expenditure of money on the part of the General Government. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] said when it was charged by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] that the bill was only an entering-wedge to open the Treasury so that the people of Pennsylvania and the citizens of Philadelphia and the centennial commissioners could put in their hands and take money out to pay the expense of this exhibition—I say the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] then said that the bill would not lead to any expenditure of money on the part of the General Government to pay the expenses of the centennial commissioners, because we had paid the expenses of our own commissioners to London and to Vienna, and so did every other nation, and that in like manner every State should bear the expense of its own commission appointed to superintend the exhibition of their own products. I say up to that time nobody claimed that any money would be wanted for this, so far as I know.

It is said, Mr. Chairman, foreign governments have accepted the invitation on the part of our Government. I hope they will all come. But the Federal Government is not bound to entertain them. The faith of the Government is not plighted for that purpose. Pennsylvania's plighted faith is given and the plighted faith of Philadelphia is given, and that is only where the plighted faith comes in. Further than that, upon what ground has this Government gone? Not a step. It is expressly agreed that it was to take no money from the Treasury of the United States. Every State understands it. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, and the gentlemen of the House is not the faith of the Government pledged expressly that no money shall be taken from the Treasury of the United States for this purpose? I should like to know how gentlemen are going back to their constituents when it was expressly agreed that no money should be taken from the Treasury and that nobody should pledge the faith of the Government to pay any money out of the Treasury—I should like to know how gentlemen are going back to their constituents after voting for this bill and explain their action.

Further than that, Mr. Chairman, in this time of financial distress when we have cut off almost all public enterprises, when we have discharged men from our navy-yards, and all our public works are stopped—I ask, with the Treasury running lower every day is it wise, is it just, is it honest to take money for this purpose from the Treasury of the people when that money is due to our creditors?

Let me say to you, Mr. Chairman, however much glory there may be in store for us—and I will grant, for the sake of the argument, that "eye hath not seen nor ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man, to conceive the glories that shall be revealed" in this centennial celebration—let me say to you that, after all that has been done, something more will be required than mere words to help on the prosperity of the different sections of the country. If there is to be a draft on the Treasury, Mr. Chairman, let the North and the East reach out their hands to receive the hands of the South, now outstretched to them, and help them onward in their material interests by opening to unrestricted navigation that mighty river which constituted the great artery that kept alive and warm the spirit of the Union during the darkest hour of the rebellion. Let us unite on some judicious system of internal improvement and laws which shall promote alike the interests of all sections of the Republic. Let us develop our resources, until every water-fall shall be utilized, every mine operated, every fertile acre cultivated; until our commerce, whitening all the navigable waters of the globe, shall carry off the superabundant products of our soil and our mines and our manufactures to every nation, race, and tribe of men. Then we shall have no need to pray that we may know each other better in order that we may love each other more. We shall then be one homogeneous people, having a common interest, directed by a common policy, the greatest good to the whole people. And then will be realized what Providence has designed to be realized on this continent alone, the sublimest conception of the excellence of republican institutions and the brightest vision of the lovers of liberty in any part of the world.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CAIN. It is because the race to which I belong have been received into the nation as a part and parcel of it that I regard it as a duty which I owe to my constituency, and to those with whom I am more especially identified, at least to express my sentiments in relation to the great national celebration which is to take place in this country. Interested now as we never were before in all the interests of this country, brought into a happy relationship with those interests such as we never before enjoyed, it seems to me, sir, to be befitting that we should express our interest in whatever concerns all the citizens of this country.

We anticipate, sir, with pleasure the celebration of our national birthday. I will not detain the committee by speaking of the financial question connected with this subject. Gentlemen far more able than myself, who have grappled with the financial question, have discussed it pro and con, and therefore I deem it unnecessary that I should say anything on that branch of the subject. One or two other considerations, however, present themselves to my mind, and to these I shall invite the attention of the committee for a few moments.

Objections are made to the celebration on the ground that the nati a is too poor, that it will cost too much, and that we are not now prepared to give $3,000,000 to such an enterprise as this. Now, if it be urged that on the score of poverty we ought to desist from engaging in any noble enterprise, I would only point to the vast wealth of our nation, to its growth, to its constantly accumulating wealth. No nation on this globe, in my judgment, has made such rapid progress in developing its resources, in creating, so to speak, vast wealth as our nation has done. It is objected that in the present condition of the country we are not prepared to enter upon this enterprise. We are told that the Secretary of the Treasury has informed us that we are still increasing the national debt. That may be true; it is true; but is this a sufficient reason why we should decline to undertake so noble an enterprise as the celebration of the hundredth year of the nation's independence? Is it not, sir, an object of sufficient magnitude for the nation to make a sacrifice of a few million dollars? Are not the people of this country willing to make that sacrifice, and to tax themselves, so to speak, for the purpose of celebrating so great an event as the nation's hundredth birthday?

Let us ask ourselves, what influence will this great event of the centennial celebration have upon the prosperity of the nation? Admitting that it will cost $3,000,000, the question comes back, will the nation be advantaged in proportion to the expenditure which will be required to carry out the enterprise? If we can settle this question in the affirmative, it seems to me that we should not have much trouble in settling the other question, whether or not we ought to give $3,000,000 for this purpose.

The beneficial influences, Mr. Chairman, which I believe this centennial celebration would have on the nation far outstretch the comparatively paltry sum of $3,000,000. If we will bring together the people of this nation as they have never been brought together before; if we give a powerful impetus to progress in science, in art, in literature, in sculpture, in agriculture, and in commerce; and if by its means we bring here the gold of Europe and vast numbers of visitors from other nations; if by means of this celebration we quicken the energies of the people of our country throughout its whole length and breadth by bringing our citizens together to celebrate the nation's birthday—if we accomplish all this, it does appear to me that we shall lose nothing by appropriating a few million dollars to carry out the enterprise.

It has been said by gentlemen on this floor that the people are not ready for it. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether this assertion be true in regard to particular sections of the country. I have always, however, found the people ready to respond to any great enterprise for the promotion of their welfare and for their advancement which has been brought before them. This celebration, as I have said, will exert a most beneficent influence on the commerce of the country. Our vessels will be laden with the commerce of other nations. Gold will be brought to our land. The energies of our people will be quickened. Our mining interests, all the vast interests of our spreading country, will be brought out before the world as they never have been before. The laboring class of the country will feel an interest in this great enterprise.

But, Mr. Chairman, it has been remarked that very few, comparatively speaking, of our constituents will visit the centennial exhibition and see all these great developments of science and art. That may be true; but it is also a fact that whatever tends to national progress, whatever affects national character, affects the whole nation. Every man, woman, and child in this country will feel the influence of this great enterprise. More than that; it will have an influence in the future history of our nation. We are making history, Mr. Chairman; and every effort of the nation of this description tending to the advancement of human progress will be felt in the future by every citizen of the country. Then, too, sir, it will have a harmonizing influence on this nation. Hitherto we have had the North and the South, the East and the West; but by this gathering together of all sections national harmony and national unity shall be brought about. When from every hamlet of our land and from every kingdom beyond the sea shall have been gathered all the developments of science and art, when there shall be presented in this fine hall to be erected at Philadelphia the fruits of the genius of every nation and of every people, of every factory and every workshop, of every mechanic and every artisan, and when they shall be displayed in that vast area, each man will be able to see at one glance the greatness of his nation and the genius of the people to which he belongs. This gathering will have a happy and mollifying influence. Each man there will see that he is a part and parcel of this nation. And, sir, I particularly desire in behalf of the race to which I belong that we shall have a place in this great gathering of the nation. I hope to see there evidences of the development of the genius of my race. I hope to see there that which shall effectually repel the charge often made of a lack of genius on their part. Through long years of slavery they have waited patiently the coming of the happy era when they can feel that they are a part and parcel of this great nation. We have our cotton-fields, our rice-fields, our corn-fields, our iron mines, and our coal-fields. We have the work of our mechanics and artisans, and I desire for my race a place in this grand and noble structure. Let all races be represented there as evidence of the unity of the nations of mankind, and of that more happy and glorious era which is dawning upon this country.

Mr. Chairman, this assemblage at Philadelphia will have an influence in healing the wounds caused by the war. When men from every section gather there, look each other in the face, when they meet together on a common level and see the results of the genius and the arts of all of them, they will realize as never before our common brotherhood. Sir, I would heal every wound caused by the war; I would raise up that people with whom I am identified, and place them in the enjoyment of all the privileges and blessings which any citizens of this great nation enjoy. I opine that by the time of this centennial celebration we shall have passed the civil-rights bill, we shall have passed the general-amnesty bill; and the North and the South, the East and the West, can shake hands together under the dome of that great building, surrounded by all the developments of genius, of science, of art, of sculpture, of learning, and shall there stand united as never before—the men of all races on this continent. And then shall be brought to pass the realization of the sentiment that all men are equal and entitled to enjoy the same rights and immunities.

Mr. Chairman, I close with the thought that the celebration will give an impetus to the country such as has never before been realized in the history of mankind. I believe that whatever appropriation may be necessary to carry out this great work will be returned to us twofold. It may not come back into the Treasury; but it will come in the development of the industries, of the genius of the country. By this great celebration we shall realize how great we are and how wonderful has been our progress.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of this subject awakens sentiments which I honor, and abounds in appeals to the imagination which every man must feel the force of. It appeals to much that is high and worthy in American character, and awakens that spirit of patriotism to which no man on this floor ought to be insensible. It places the House in a situation in which men are apt to forget the stubborn facts that lie behind sentiment—facts that relate to the great forces which are now acting with peculiar force upon the prosperity and the necessities of the nation. It is an occasion when men are apt to give rein to sentiment and forget to apply that calm judgment which ought to be applied to the management of public affairs.

In the few moments allowed me I shall try to discuss the merits of the pending question, and I invoke the deliberate judgment of the House in determining what we ought to do with the pending measure.

The first question to be answered is this: Is the national faith pledged to the support of an international exposition at Philadelphia? If so, even though that pledge may have been hastily and unwisely given, yet, if the national faith is so pledged, I will vote not only for this appropriation but for as many more as may be needed to discharge our obligation to the uttermost, and to preserve the public faith inviolate. Let any man convince me that the faith and the honor of the nation are pledged, and it answers all questions and silences all criticism so far as I am concerned. In that case I shall insist that we impose at once a sufficient tax on the nation to meet that demand.

But, sir, I have carefully examined the acts of Congress and of the Executive in relation to this subject, and have listened to the arguments made in this House and in the Senate, and I have reached the conclusion that nothing has been done or promised by Congress or by any officer of the Government which pledges the public faith to appropriate any money out of the Treasury for the support of an international exposition in 1876. On the contrary, at every step Congress has plainly declared that it would not be so bound. Every act of legislation relating to this subject has been accompanied by a solemn declaration that the action of Congress in the premises shall not be so construed as to create any liability of the United States, directly or indirectly, for any obligation or expense incurred by the exhibition.

To this remark there is a single exception. Last year I brought into the House from the Committee on Appropriations a clause in an appropriation bill to appropriate $20,000 to pay for printing the certificates of stock for the centennial association, and I did so because there was a provision in one of the statutes relating to this commission that the United States should cause these certificates to be engraved and printed. The Committee on Appropriations recommended the payment of that amount because the national faith was pledged. But it will be remembered that the friends of the exhibition told us at that time that the printing of those certificates was the only thing in reference to which our faith was pledged. Now in the face of the declaration, the plain, unqualified declaration, that no expense whatever should be chargeable to the United States, the bill before us does in terms say that there shall be paid out of the national Treasury $3,000,000 toward the expenses of the exhibition, thereby nullifying all that we have done in the way of protecting the Government.

Before passing from this question of the public faith I desire to quote a few paragraphs from a speech of the late Senator Sumner, which was made on this subject in the Senate only a few days before his death. There have been but few men in the nation to whom the public faith and the glory and honor of the Republic were more sacred. The speech was made by the late Senator but eight weeks ago, and was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 7, 1874. I quote the following paragraphs:

> But, sir, another topic has been introduced into this debate, which figures largely, and on which the advocates of this proposition expend argument and eloquence. It is, that the public faith is pledged. Sir, I do not know that I should have said a word to-day—I think I should not—but for the manner in which this argument has been pressed; and I may add, also, the personal allusions from time to time to myself in this connection. I know something of the origin of this original bill. I know to what extent the public faith is pledged. I am a witness, and I take the stand. The bill came from the other House, where it was introduced by a friend of this measure, being, as I understood, supplied to him by one of the Philadelphia associates. It passed the other House, as many measures too frequently pass that House, and came to the Senate. I think I may say the moment it was understood the feeling was adverse. It was said—I am speaking now of conversations—that it was on its face an impracticable measure, involving the country, possibly, in considerable expense. Then it was that Senators against it, or not inclining to its support, said, "Very well; if you will accept the bill with the condition relieving the United States from all liability, there will be no objection. It is in the nature of an act of incorporation; and we give you these large powers, but with no responsibility on the part of the United States." Such was the understanding, and such was the condition expressly, positively, openly introduced into the bill.
> Senators speak of pledges, of conditions. Sir, there is but one real pledge in this bill; there is but one real condition. That pledge is, that the United States shall not be called to pay a dollar; the condition is that our Government is relieved of all responsibility on account of this undertaking; and that is the ruling condition to which all else is subordinate. * * * * * * * *
> Public faith, sir! Nothing is more beautiful, more sacred, sacrosanct, than the public faith, always to be preserved, and never to be invoked with levity; and permit me to say that when my friend invokes it on this occasion, it seems more like comedy than truth. Unquestionably the public faith is the other way. The public faith is solemnly pledged in this business to economy and to an absolute abnegation on the part of the United States.
>
> Not content with this condition in one statute, the other statute, creating the financial board, repeats it:
>
> "Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to create any liability of the United States, direct or indirect, for any debt or obligation incurred, nor for any claim, by the centennial international exhibition, or the corporation hereby created, for aid or pecuniary assistance from Congress or the Treasury of the United States, in support or liquidation of any debt or obligations created by the corporation herein authorized."

If there were not fifty members on this floor, who could give similar evidence, the testimony of this distinguished witness would be conclusive on the question of public faith.

But I admit that our duty is not decided by determining that the public faith is not pledged, for it may still be true that we ought to make this appropriation on its own merits. It is urged with great eloquence and earnestness that the object to be attained is one so great and so worthy and so related to the public good, that this appropriation ought to be made to insure the success of the plan which has been adopted in reference to the centennial. That brings me to the merits of the enterprise as it is now presented by the company that has the control of the proposed exhibition.

I have given this subject what study I could, and I have come to this conclusion for myself. The original purpose for which the centennial commission was created has been entirely departed from in the course of the last year, and a new scheme, not known to Congress when the company was chartered, not here discussed, not here contemplated, has now been brought forward, namely, an international exposition. I admit that in the title of the first act of incorporation by the use of the word "international" there was a hint of such a purpose; but in the body of the act and in the discussion upon it in this House it was understood that a national celebration was to be held.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for one moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have but little time.

Mr. KELLEY. You will find that the bill provides for the admission of various articles, that it provides for the exhibition of our products in comparison with those of older nations; that there was this distinct recognition of the fact that it was to be international and competitive to all the world.

Mr. GARFIELD. The admission of articles from foreign countries into an exhibition does not constitute an international exhibition. Had such a purpose been contemplated the bill would have provided for negotiations with foreign governments to unite in getting up the exhibition.

For a fuller answer than I have time to make I will refer to the speech of the lamented Senator Sumner, delivered in the Senate February 27, in which will be found a careful examination of all the legislation on this subject from beginning to end. He points out where it was that the international feature was injected into this plan as an after-thought; that it was not intended by the founders. And it was that new feature which the great Senator denounced as unwise and indefensible. I quote a paragraph:

> But after a while the commemoration of American independence and the national birthday, which so filled the soul of the elder Adams, was not enough for our commissioners, and they undertook to supplement the national celebration by a world's fair. To my mind one of these is enough for any commission. The two together are too much. They are more than any commission ought to undertake. But this is a mild statement. The two are essentially separate and distinct in character, being inharmonious, inconsistent, and incongruous. The two do not go together naturally, and yet they are to be put together. They will be no better than twins bound together by an unnatural ligament, so as to be a constant burden to each other—of which those now on the table of the surgeons in Philadelphia are the unhappy prototype, each stunting and dwarfing the other. One is essentially national and domestic; the other international and cosmopolitan. One is for the American people; the other for all people. One is to exalt republican institutions and advance their predestined sway; the other is to court and win the monarchies of the Old World to appear at our great banquet, and to swell its pomp. * * *
> I may err; but to my mind it is plain that the proposed combination is a mistake which, if persisted in, must end in detriment to the anniversary and to the world's fair. If one gains the other must suffer.

I remember very well all the discussion of the two bills which this House passed creating the centennial commission. This was the spirit in which we passed them; having disclaimed any responsibility on the part of the United States beyond printing the certificates of stock, agreeing only to give it a national character and indorsement, we treated it rather as a great public celebration, empowered to manage its own business in its own way. In that view, and on that ground alone, it became a law.

A national exposition, a national exhibition, is clearly and plainly within the grasp of that corporation without our assistance. In such an exhibition as they might have, making it national, and leaving off its international features, they would have the sympathy and enthusiastic support of the people of the United States; but when they enlarge it to the proportions of an international exposition, (a thing which should never be attempted except by the General Government itself,) they must have a vast building to accommodate not one but thirty nations of the earth. From this new plan comes the necessity for great expenditures. For this they need as a first necessity five or six million dollars to erect suitable buildings and fixtures to accommodate an assemblage of nations. This is the feature that swells the figures of this plan to the enormous proportions they have now assumed.

In this connection I wish to remark that if it were now an open question, and if our Treasury were full, I would unhesitatingly say that of all the years in the century 1876 is the year when an international exposition should not be held in America. And I say this for three reasons. In the first place, it is too soon after the last international exposition. There have never been two international expositions within three years of each other. The last one was held six years after the preceding one, and it is generally acknowledged that it was held too soon. Six years of inventions, six years of national growth, do not bring out enough that is new to call the world together to see what has been done in the interval. If now we attempt to have an international exposition only three years after the failure at Vienna, we shall (whether Congress aids the enterprise or not) witness a disastrous, a most humiliating failure. This is my belief; and my pride as an American citizen cannot tolerate the thought that in that year, of all the years in the century, we shall make a conspicuous and mortifying failure, as I firmly believe we shall.

Then there is another reason. The expositions of Europe have been held in a country where twenty nations are within almost daily communication. Sweep a radius from any one of their expositions eight hundred miles away, and you include within the circumference two hundred and fifty millions of people. Sweep a similar radius around Philadelphia and you do not include more than thirty millions. When great and rich and densely populated countries make failures in their expositions, it is simply impossible that we can now call the nations of the world together across three thousand miles of ocean and in our sparsely populated country equal Vienna in the magnitude of exhibition. For this reason I believe the international feature of this enterprise is most unwise and unfortunate.

But there is another reason, a reason of patriotic sentiment, which to me outweighs all others. Of all the days in the century the Fourth of July, 1876, is the day for home use, for our own country, for the celebration of its own achievements as against all the world; the day on which we should review the record of the century and inquire what we have done—to walk about the bulwarks of our national temple, to tell its towers and review its progress; to rekindle the fires on our own altars. On that day I want no monarchs as guests to sit at our tables, unless they choose to come as spectators. It ought to be, and unless we prevent it it will be, a day when all over this land voluntary associations will commemorate the past hundred years; and in no place should there be so great and so solemn assembly as in the city of Philadelphia where the nation was spoken into being. We want then no foreign intrusion, but a national jubilee of our own.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, there is in the proposed plan an incongruity that gentlemen have not sufficiently appreciated. Let us invoke the spirit of patriotism that dwells and glows in our people to make the Fourth of July, 1876, a solemn day of recognition of the past, of study of the present, of forecasting the future; but not a day of vaunting ourselves before the nations of the earth, whose thrones we have done so much to shatter, whose institutions we have done so much to overthrow.

What was the great inspiring idea that gave birth to our Republic? Mr. Chairman, I never review that portion of our history without a feeling of awe when I reflect that our fathers came forward upon the stage of the world with two utterances that were not then recognized as true anywhere in the world except in the closet of students and dreamers. Rousseau in his Social Contract had discussed the rights of mankind. Locke a little earlier had reasoned of those rights. Even Fenelon in his wonderful book had put some of these truths into the mouth of Mentor when he instructed Telemachus. But no nation had ventured to enunciate, no republic had ventured to adopt, the two immortal doctrines which our fathers announced to the world on the 4th of July, 1776. They calmly declared that all men are created equal in rights; and that no government has any right to be, except by consent of the governed. Where did our fathers learn those two great oracles? They would not deign to debate them; they declared them to be self-evident truths, in support of which they would condescend to offer no argument. They set them forth as immortal, everlasting truths. On those two truths they built our Republic; and from them have sprung its greatness and glory. Now, what could be more fitting than that around all the hearth-stones in this Republic we should commemorate the birth of these ideas and the establishment of our nation? If other nations care to look on and wonder at the spectacle, let them do so; but let us not bring them here to be our guests while we glory over what we have achieved against them and their institutions.

One word more in another direction. The duties imposed upon me as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations require me to do many things which the imperative necessities of our financial situation demand, and but for which I should be glad to advocate a more liberal policy. At the beginning of this session we were confronted with the imperative necessity to tax or retrench; and in obedience to what I believe to be the almost unanimous voice of this House, the Committee on Appropriations have been cutting down expenditures wherever they could. Enterprises of the greatest national moment we have clipped to narrow compass to avoid the collapse of the Treasury. Fifteen million dollars were asked for to open our rivers and deepen our harbors. That amount has been sheared down to $4,500,000, because of the imperative necessities of the Treasury. We have gone over the civil list cutting down salaries and mustering out employés. In one bill which passed last week we have thus made a saving of more than $3,500,000. I feel sometimes that we have behaved meanly in reducing the number and pay of hard-worked employés of the Government. I have advocated these measures mainly on the ground of overmastering necessity.

But it is now proposed to take all the savings of that bill and fling them into this new enterprise, only to be certainly followed by seven, perhaps ten millions more before we are through.

Can gentlemen do this without violating all the pledges we have given by our votes thus far? Can gentlemen do this and look without shame at the great industrial enterprises of the nation which we have been compelled almost to cripple in order to get through the year without going to protest or levying new taxes? What man of the West can look upon the Mississippi River without feeling that we owe it to the future of the United States to enter upon a plan of expenditures that will amount perhaps to fifteen or twenty million dollars to make that river and its tributaries what they should be—the greatest inland water highway on the earth? I am in favor of such a work the moment the Treasury is in a condition to do it.

Will you now vote three millions, to be followed by more, to this enterprise, neglecting the vast commercial interests of the United States? What we give here must be taken from other objects of national importance. Weigh this appropriation, gentlemen, against other appropriations which we ought to make, and then determine, with all the facts before you, whether it is wise to embark upon this experiment when many of the best men of the country tell us the plan is a mistake which must end in failure. It is not too late to correct this grave error.

Let us take the advice of Senator Sumner, given in his last days upon the earth, when he said:

> There is something easier and more practical. It is to bring the Philadelphia enterprise at once into subordination to the original idea—to abandon the ex post facto substitute and make the commemoration national and republican.

In concluding his speech he said:

> Now, sir, allow me to say that I have three earnest desires in connection with our coming anniversary:
>
> First. To secure a proper commemoration of that great day, truly worthy of this Republic, and characteristic, so that republican institutions shall thereby gain.
> Secondly. To save the national character, which must suffer if the present scheme is pursued.
>
> And thirdly, to save the national Treasury.
> For these reasons I trust that this bill, which is so justly revealed as an appropriation bill, should be referred to the committee having charge of such bills; and it should be referred without any further instructions than are abundantly found in the existing legislation of Congress and in the open declarations of the friends of this measure on other occasions, when they declared that the United States should be called upon for no contribution. Twice over has Congress given instructions on this very point—not merely the Senate, but both Houses of Congress, with the approval of the President; twice over in two different bills; once, twice. I hope that the present bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that it will take its instructions from existing acts of Congress.

These, I believe, are the last words which that statesman uttered in the Senate. In them he pointed out the path by which the country and the centennial commission may escape from the embarrassment into which the new plan has led us. This, Mr. Chairman, is the path of honor, the path of duty; let us follow it.

In saying this I say no word against Philadelphia. I honor her for her past. I say no word against the men who desire the passage of this bill. I honor them for the sentiments which animate them, but I insist that the path of duty in this case is simply to restore this undertaking to its original purpose and make it national, so that all may gather around the family hearth-stone at Philadelphia. We will not then open the door of the Treasury to a scheme which if it ever progress at all ought to be wholly under the control of Congress, wholly under the control of the Government, and not in the hands of a corporation.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I wish to suggest one consideration, because it is necessary to the point the gentleman from Ohio is making. All of the $4,500,000 which have been pledged now has been in accordance with the charter, which begins by saying it shall be an international exhibiiton. If they make it, then, a national exhibition, they lose necessarily every dollar which has been already contributed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me tell my friend from Connecticut that the word "international," which he quotes, is in the title and not in the body of the act.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. It is in the act also.

Mr. GARFIELD. The preamble alone of the first act contains the word "international."

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman is mistaken; the body of the bill also contains it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Every man here who was in the House at the time knows that the bill was allowed to pass simply because the United States bound itself by no pledge whatever, and if we now undertake an international exposition it will be because we now inaugurate it; which I hope this House will not do.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to detain the House by any extended remarks on this question. I wish only to say that I believe the good people throughout the whole country will expect and will claim that Congress and the national Government shall unite with them in commemorating the approaching centennial anniversary of the nation. There seems to me to be no better way for the national Government to assist in that celebration than the one proposed, inviting all our own people and the people of other nations to assemble at Philadelphia for that purpose on the 4th of July, 1876.

That day will be honored and celebrated in every State and city in the Union, and in none of them will the day be celebrated with more feeling and interest than in my own State and in the city of Boston. But the good people of Massachusetts will be glad to have the national Government take part in a great national celebration at Philadelphia, in which the people of every State will be interested; and they will rejoice to see the North and the South meeting together there in friendly relations, forgetting all past bitterness, and looking forward to a happy and united future.

I shall cheerfully vote for the appropriation recommended by the special committee; and I am quite sure if I voted otherwise I should be unfaithful to the Faneuil Hall district of Boston, which I have the honor to represent on this floor; and I am quite sure the good people of Massachusetts will approve of my voting in favor of the national celebration in Philadelphia.

I yield whatever time I have remaining to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SCUDDER.]

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey,. The objections which have been made against the passage of this bill upon an analysis can be resolved into two points, namely: One is that the national Government should not at the present time interfere to make this appropriation for the reason that when this measure was first brought to the attention of Congress it was accompanied with pledges that the nation should not be involved in this exhibition as an international affair. Another objection is, that the Treasury is not in a condition to meet the emergency by so large an expenditure. It has also been suggested that the time would not be propitious—that other celebrations have been held so recently that the nations of the world would not be disposed to join here with us in this celebration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so far as this Congress can be said to be barred in its action, I think there is no reasonable ground for opposition on that point. This Congress has not contracted not to make this appropriation. The parties who asked for it may have said that they would not ask an appropriation for a national exhibition. But this Congress is sovereign. It represents the nation at large. It is not bound by any contract, so far as this may be treated as a contract, and it is not in the nature of a contract. So far as the other objection is concerned, that we are not able to meet the emergency by reason of a want of money, the probability is that it will be found upon experiment that the exhibition will bring to us more money than we will expend. It will bring here largely of the wealth of the world. It will revive in our people a spirit of enterprise, of harmony, and of good-will. It will bring to our Treasury more money than we shall expend. Like the rills which flow from the mountain-sides into one common stream and swell the volume of its waters, the supplies of money from various sources will equal the appropriation from the Treasury. It is also an important matter in its moral influence upon the world.

But being a native Jerseyman, I feel constrained to vote for this measure on behalf of my own people. I feel not simply bound by the action of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, but I know that it is the feeling of the people of that State that they shall be represented in that exhibition; and they will be proud not only to meet every citizen of this great country but every citizen of the world who may see proper to join us on that great occasion. The people of New Jersey feel deeply upon this subject, for their fields were the battle-ground of the Revolution. Turn back to the winter of 1777, when Washington crossed amid snow and ice the Delaware, when he retreated upon Trenton and fought the common enemy, when he retreated to Princeton and there turned the tide of the revolutionary war. The people with those traditions, the people beneath whose soil is buried many of the heroes of the revolutionary war, that people must naturally feel a deep interest in this exhibition.

The people of New Jersey also feel a deep interest in the exhibition for this reason: On the 3d of July, 1776, they framed their State constitution, and that constitution, framed a day before the great Declaration of Independence was signed, lasted until the year 1844, and under it we grew and prospered, a conservative State, a State that respected the laws, and administered them to the high and the low, to the rich and the poor alike.

Our people are interested in that anniversary for the reason that their delegates signed the great charter of American independence. Their representatives joined in forming the Constitution of these United States. And how vast has been the influence of that Constitution in this continent! It now embraces thirty-seven States and ten Territories; and within the bounds of these States and Territories how much have we to exhibit to the people of the world! How much have we to show them of our advancement in the arts, in science, in agriculture, in mechanical skill, and in everything that makes a great and distinguished people!

Those people from abroad, sir, will come here and see our system of common-school education, which has never been surpassed in the civilized world. That will be a part of this great exhibition; for these people will come not merely to see what is gathered together in Philadelphia, but they will come to see our extended country and its great and glorious institutions. They will see our colleges, where men are educated with as much ability, care, and discipline as in the best colleges of Europe. They will see our lunatic asylums, not surpassed by those of any country, where the wandering reason of man under the care, the genius, and the skill of the most eminent physicians is called back to its once deserted throne. They will observe the institutions for the blind, and will mark the working out of that modern miracle of education and art, where the blind under the skill of great teachers have been made almost to see. They will mark the institutions of the deaf and dumb, and under the skill of the masters of those institutions they will find that the deaf have been made to hear and the dumb to speak. And when they have examined our institutions they will return, having seen what liberty can do and what a free people can accomplish.

Yes, sir, and let them see our religious institutions, fostered by no connection with the Government. They will find in every hamlet and in every valley a spire raised to heaven marking the spot where men can meet and worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences. They will become acquainted with those great missionary establishments which have sent men to all parts of the world; men who have caused the Rose of Sharon to bloom in the desolations of Africa, and the Star of Bethlehem to shine amid the polar regions of semi-annual night. For that also will be a part of this great exhibition.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, my own State will be there. The mechanics of Paterson—those men who turn out a locomotive every working day in the year, and sometimes more—they will be there to show their locomotive engines, the products of their skill and their industry, unrivaled in beauty and unequaled in power. My friends of the city of Newark will be there—Newark represented all over the world by the products of her skilled artisans. Her artisans in gold and silver, in harness and wagons, in everything that beautifies, in everything that is useful, will be there. They have already had in their own State and city exhibitions which would be creditable in any part of the world. The people of Trenton with their porcelain wares will also be represented on that occasion. I say, then, our people will be there, and will be there with great pleasure.

Let us then invite Englishmen to come, that people from whom we have derived our laws and institutions. We will invite the Scotchman, subtile in reason, brave in the field, and who has achieved so much in the advancement of civilization. We will invite the chivalrous Irishman with his fire and poetic genius. We will invite the Frenchman, skilled in the arts and distinguished for valor. We will invite the Germans here, who have recently united and established an empire, and who in that particular have followed the union of these great States under one government. We will invite the old Hollanders—those men who sent Hendrick Hudson here in 1609, who landed at Communipaw in my own district just opposite the city of New York—to come, and we will show them the spot where that great navigator landed from the Half Moon, (the vessel in which he came over,) and we will point them to the new Amsterdam, with her glorious spires, with her proud palaces, with her vast warehouses, with her harbor filled with ships engaged in domestic and foreign commerce. We will point them to my own district, where now seven steamship lines engaged in European commerce make daily trips across the Atlantic. We will show them all that great line of railroad beginning on the banks of the Hudson River, passing along westward, crossing the Alleghanies as with the flight of a bird, descending the valley of the Mississippi, passing through the defiles of the Rocky Mountains to where the Golden Gate opens to the setting sun the pathway for the commerce of the eastern world.

Under such circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I think that we should lay aside all local feelings and all impressions of a narrow and mistaken economy and go for this bill. Let us not wait for a more propitious moment, for the time which is most desirable. The impulse is on us now. The spirit is upon our people now. They will engage in this festival, in this celebration, at all events. They will spend the money that is necessary. They will meet from the North and the South, from the East and the West. The time, then, seeming to have been selected above all others as most propitious, according to our own feeling, our own sentiments, let us vote this appropriation to make the celebration international.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JEWETT] desires to be heard, and I am willing that he shall precede me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there are thirty minutes yet remaining of the time allowed for debate, of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JEWETT] is entitled to ten minutes, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to twenty minutes. The gentleman from Ohio will now proceed.

Mr. JEWETT. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended taking any part in this discussion. When the General Assembly of the State of Ohio provided for the appointment of commissioners to represent the State at the proposed exhibition, I took it for granted that the members of that body acted in accordance with the well-known wishes and feelings of the people, and that it remained for me, as one of the Representatives of the people of that State in this body, to simply give such vote upon this or any other measure in which the success of the enterprise was involved as would in my judgment be most conducive to its success and enable those having it in charge to make it profitable as well as creditable to the country. Conceiving this to be my plain duty, and being content with the simple discharge of that duty without consuming the valuable time of the House in discussion, I did not give to any of the questions which have been so elaborately argued here a critical examination. The discussion of yesterday led me to doubt the propriety of the vote which I had proposed to give, and impressed me with the importance of examining more carefully into the relations of the Government to the proposed exhibition and the duties devolving upon me as one of the Representatives of the people in voting for or against the bill now under consideration.

I am in favor of preserving in the minds of the people a vivid recollection of the birth, the rise, and the progress of our Republic. I am in favor on all proper occasions of directing their attention to the perils of its infancy, and to the still greater perils which threatened it in its more mature years. But whether or not the time, the place, or the manner for the proposed celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of our independence is the proper time, the proper place, and best manner which could have been selected and adopted for the ends proposed, it occurs to me are questions which it is now too late to consider. These questions, in my opinion, have all been prejudged by Congress. The necessary legislation has been had. The Executive has discharged his duty under the law; the commissioners and other officers, to the extent required of them, have in good faith represented the Government, and in no respect gone beyond the letter and spirit of the law in the discharge of any of the duties devolving upon them. They have arrived at the point, however, when the aid of the Government is needed to enable them to proceed further in carrying out and putting into effect the provisions of the law. To extending this aid objection is now made. My distinguished colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] to whose judgment under ordinary circumstances I would cheerfully defer, in a speech just made, presents many cogent reasons why the bill should not pass. He, however, admits that if one word can be found in the laws of Congress, or in the proceedings of those designated by the law, by which we were in honor committed to the celebration, whatever the consequences might be, he would give his sanction to this bill or to any other needed to make the celebration a success.

Mr. Chairman, my inquiries, with a view to deciding upon my duty in the premises, commenced at this point. Is the question an original one? Am I at liberty to ignore the past, and to act as though no previous legislation had been had? Was there any committal on the part of Congress, not to our own people, but to other nations and the people of other nations, by which in honor we were bound, and which we could not honorably disregard? These were questions which presented themselves to my mind, and which could be answered only by consulting the laws and the proceedings of our officers and agents had in pursuance to law. I do not intend, Mr. Chairman, to enter upon an elaborate examination and discussion of these laws and proceedings, but will content myself with simply stating them in the order in which they transpired.

Previous to the convening of Congress on the first Monday of December, 1870, the subject-matter of our approaching centennial anniversary had claimed the attention and been the theme of discussion among the people. That something should be done in commemoration of it was conceded by all, but what that something should be was left for further and future consideration and decision. Shortly after the meeting of that Congress the propriety of commemorating in some national way the one-hundredth anniversary of our national independence became the subject-matter of congressional discussion. No doubt, Mr. Chairman, in that as in many other discussions in this Hall, extravagant language was used, and extravagant pledges and promises were made. It is said that one or more members from the State of Pennsylvania pledged that State to the entire expense of the exhibition, and gave assurances that Congress should never be called on for an appropriation in its behalf. I doubt not, sir, such pledges were made; and if the reputation and honor of those representatives or their constituents, or even the State of Pennsylvania, were alone involved, I might be persuaded to join with members in holding that State responsible for the pledge. But, Mr. Chairman, Congress acted upon no such theory. It had in view not only a national celebration, but in connection therewith an international exhibition, to which the people of all nations with whom we were in communication were to be invited, and to whom such invitations have been extended by the President, as required by law, and by many of them have been accepted.

The first act of Congress on the subject was passed March 3, 1871. That act was entitled "An act to provide for celebrating the one-hundredth anniversary of our national independence; and to celebrate it by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and the products of the soil and mine." The exhibition, then, was to be an international one; it was to be open to the people of all nations alike. After providing for the appointment of commissioners, reserving to the Government the supervision and absolute control of all their proceedings, it is by the last section of the law made the duty of the President, upon receiving the information therein provided for through the Department of State, to make proclamation of the same, giving information as to the time and place of holding the exhibition, and also making it his duty to communicate to the diplomatic representatives of all nations copies of such proclamation, together with such regulations as the commissioners might adopt, for publication in their respective countries.

The next act of Congress was on the 1st day of June, 1872, by which a corporation was created to have charge of the conducting and management of the exhibition. This corporation is a national one. It owes its being to the law of Congress, is subject to its control, and reports in conformity to its requirements. Shortly after the enactment of this law the President was informed by the governor of the State of Pennsylvania that provision had been made for suitable buildings for the purposes of the exhibition, and was also informed by the commissioners of the regulations which had been adopted by them for the conducting of the exhibition.

Among these regulations was a cordial invitation to every nation of the earth to be represented at the exhibition by its arts, industries, progress, and development.

The President, being thus informed, did, through the Department of State, make proclamation of the same, setting forth the time and place of holding the exhibition and communicating the regulations adopted by the commissioners, among which was the invitation to all nations.

The President not only made this proclamation, but, as it became the representative of a great people and a great nation, proud of its past and its present and full of hope for the future, he expressed the wish that all the nations would participate in the exhibition, that we might have a full comparison of the arts, industries, and products of the world.

Such, Mr. Chairman, is a brief statement of the legislation of Congress on this subject and of the proceedings of the proper officers and representatives of the Government in our behalf. How were they understood by the governments to whom the proclamation of the President, as required by law, was communicated? It was invariably regarded as a governmental invitation, in response to which, and returning thanks for which, it was spoken of as the invitation of the Government of the United States.

To make it an international exhibition, it was necessary to invite the people of other nations, through their respective governments, to participate therein. Their presence could not be otherwise expected. Congress declared that it should be international, and made it the duty of the President, the nation's representative, through the Department of State, to bring the subject to the attention of the diplomatic representatives of all nations, that their people might be advised of the time and place of holding the exhibition and of the regulations adopted for its management. Now, can there be any question as to the design of all this? Was it not intended by Congress to authorize an invitation?

In answering these questions, Mr. Chairman, my mind is in no doubt. An invitation was intended. An invitation has been tendered, and by many of the foreign governments accepted; but the commissioners have failed in securing from the various States the individual financial aid anticipated, and now report to this Congress, as they are required by law to report, their doings in the premises and the probability of the failure of the enterprise for the want of means. This report does not come from the State of Pennsylvania, nor from the members of Congress who assumed to indemnify the United States against any liability whatever. It is the report of commissioners appointed by authority of the law of Congress, the persons selected by the proper authorities of the Government to represent us in the management of this great enterprise. In behalf of the United States—not of the State of Pennsylvania nor of the people of the State of Pennsylvania, but of the people of all the States—they ask the intervention of Congress that the celebration and exhibition may not prove a failure. Our invitations have gone abroad; responses from many of the governments have been received accepting and thanking the Government of the United States for the invitation; but those who are opposed to the proposed appropriation now ask us to deny the authority upon which these invitations were given, and to communicate to the nations of the world an authoritative withdrawal of them. Mr. Chairman, where would we stand in such a contingency?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAWES. If I could have as much time after two o'clock, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JEWETT] may want to conclude his remarks, I would not object to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not within the power of the Committee of the Whole, even by unanimous consent, to extend the time of any gentleman. Whatever time is given to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JEWETT] must be taken from the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

Mr. DAWES. I regret exceedingly that that is so.

Mr. MYERS. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will be allowed to conclude his remarks, which are very interesting.

Mr. NIBLACK. If nobody objects, cannot the gentleman from Ohio go on?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will bear in mind what the Speaker said before he left the chair; that under the rules there was no power in Committee of the Whole to extend the time of any member, even by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will have leave to print the remainder of his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to that.

Mr. JEWETT. I have not reduced any remarks to writing.

The committee rose informally, and Mr. WHEELER took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had concurred in the resolution of the House to print the addresses made in the Senate and in the House of Representatives upon the death of Hon. Charles Sumner.

The message further announced that the Senate requested the return from the House of Representatives of the bill (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits and amendatory of the acts in relation thereto, with the Senate amendments.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 733) regulating gas-works.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps, after insisting upon taking the floor, I could hardly say that I had promised myself when this debate commenced that I would not indulge in it at any stage of it. And I did not think in its progress that I should find it necessary to depart from that rule until the tone of those who have advocated this measure took expression in the remark of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] yesterday, when he singled me out by name as an example and an illustration of those who in opposing this measure propose to render this country less precious than it otherwise would be. Sir, I am not in the habit of making professions of regard for this country or for its honor. Nor am I in the habit, unless some overt act justifies it, of permitting any gentleman ostentatiously to exhibit before this House his own exceeding love for his country, and wind up by saying that I, specified by name, propose, in differing from him upon this floor, to make the country less precious than it otherwise would be. However I may differ with others as to the means of attaining the result, I think, sir, that I have as tender a regard, as anxious a solicitude, for what may be the true honor of this country as any other man—almost as much as the gentleman from Maine. I am not impelled to take the floor at this moment from any desire, however, to put myself especially in the front to antagonize or compete with that sentimental statesmanship or that other kind of emotional patriotism of which the gentleman from Maine says he has made it his specialty. I have only felt as if it were my duty to invite him and those who soar with him in this debate to come down, if they will, to the stubborn facts—to descend to solid ground; for even the eagle, soaring as he does with his eye to the sun, is compelled sometimes to alight. If my friend will come down to the stubborn facts, I ask him to look at the balance-sheet. This is a proposition to take $3,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States. It is not there. Where is it to come from? I hold in my hand the last balance-sheet furnished us by the Government. We have but two months more to make up the final sheet for the year. Thus far the concluding lines are these:

Increase of the public debt since June, 1873, $1,906,563.65.

Up to the beginning of the eleventh month of the current year we have not as yet brought the two ends, expenditures and receipts, together. We have less than two months before we shall make the final balance. While within the last two or three months we have been gaining upon the indebtedness in which the country was involved by an excess of expenditures over receipts—a gain measured by which there is every prospect that we can when the end of the year comes round wipe out the remaining $2,000,000 of that indebtedness—yet there stands off against it the fact that not only did we thus bring the two ends together last year, but in addition thereto we paid $43,000,000 of the public debt, not one dollar of which have we as yet paid this year.

Whatever may be our flights, however ostentatiously we may declare that we are indifferent to what our constituents may say, I take the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] more frank than any of their associates in the advocacy of this bill, at their word, because no other way is open to meet this expenditure than that which they say is the way—the same way, according to their own statement, by which in the midst of the war we raised three or four million dollars a day to carry on this Government. That is the way, according to these gentlemen, by which we are to raise these $3,000,000. What was that method? Either by taxation, or by borrowing, at a discount of from 40 to 100 per cent. in the standard of the world, money to be paid by posterity. Sir, let my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] remember that the tax-gatherer went down into his district, and that the east wind was not more searching between the bones and the marrow of every man than was the tax-gatherer in searching between the bones and the marrow of every industry in this land in order to raise the $4,000,000 a day in the manner in which the gentleman tells us our contribution to this centennial celebration is to be raised.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right here?

Mr. DAWES. I cannot spare one moment for that indulgence. Sir, let the tax-gatherer take his eagle in one hand and this tax bill in the other; let him go down into Maine, and the intermingling tears and jubilant hallelujahs of my distinguished friend from that State will all be required to satisfy the people of his district that it is quite proper for us to go back to the methods of the war in order to supply the means of having a grand exhibition in Philadelphia.

At the commencement of this session the executive department of the United States sent to us two bills which I have here in my hand, calling upon us to increase taxation to the amount of about $40,000,000 in order to meet current expenses. Here is one of the identical bills now in committee that came to us asking us to meet this deficiency. Let me read a clause of this bill, and let me ask my friend from Maine or any other gentleman in this House whether if I offered such a measure to meet this exigency it would command a singe vote in this House.

Be it enacted, That upon teas of all kinds imported from and after the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid the duty of fifteen cents per pound; and upon coffee of all kinds imported from and after the pasage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of three cents per pound.

There is the identical paper sent to us at the beginning of this session by the executive department. We have sought about trying to obviate the necessity of imposing any such tax upon the "free breakfast table" of the thirty-two districts of New York, represented by my distinguished friend, [Mr. TREMAIN,] and the district in Maine represented by my other friend, [Mr. FRYE,] who say they do not care what their constituents think about this vote. My friend from New York has employed Uncle Toby's angel to blot out his vote; and my friend from Maine has taken the wings of the eagle and soared out of sight of his constituents and of any care they may have for him.

But, sir, the exigency has not passed away. Only last week the President of the United States in his veto message called our minds back to the subject of taxation, and told us that before we could have free banking, before we could redeem our promises, we must, as a preparatory measure, have this taxation. Yet, sir, my friend from Maine goes into spasms of indignation at the idea that our honor is to be tarnished because, he says, the President of the United States has invited foreign nations to come to this exhibition.

But rather than tarnish the honor of the nation he will borrow himself, and by his energy and that of these people in renewed taxation and renewed borrowing, to no matter what depth, in order to save us from that dishonor; while the President of the United States through his Secretary of State has told us this note, this proclamation which has so alarmed these gentlemen, has not the slightest invitation in it. Here is the statement of the Secretary of State, which for some unaccountable reasons I cannot find in this assorted document entitled "The National Centennial." It is somewhere among the archives of the State Department, but for some reason it is left out of this book. That letter of the Secretary of State puts to rest forever the claim that the President of the United States ever intended or ever did invite any nation, in any such sense, to participate in and manage, or have any control or voice in any international exhibition.

Now, sir, there is another pledge of this Government, made before this note was renewed—made, sir, long ago—which cannot be kept if you pass this bill. And I ask my friend from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] who did me the honor to retire from his seat as soon as I commenced these remarks—I say I call his attention, and that of any other gentleman upon whom this idea of national honor has struck so deep—to the fact that there is another pledge of this Government—I call the attention of all—there are obligations, which cannot be kept if we pass this bill; that there is the solemn pledge of this Government, now unredeemed, to pay before the 1st day of July next into the sinking fund $29,100,000. Not a dollar has been paid and not a dollar can be paid. The pledge of the Government is before you that before you take a dollar out of the Treasury for this purpose $29,100,000 shall be put into the sinking fund.

These are the obligations of the Government: First is the interest on the national debt; secondly, the sinking fund; thirdly, the appropriations for such purpose as Congress may deem proper. I invite gentlemen who are so troubled about the national honor in regard to a note of invitation written upon a piece of paper to turn their attention to the fact that this pledge of the Government of the United States stands unredeemed, and cannot be redeemed if you take these $3,000,000 out of the Treasury, but stands broken before the nations of the earth.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Who is the chairman of the Committee on Finance?

Mr. DAWES. I am chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Redeem, then, the honor of the nation.

Mr. DAWES. That does not make money.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Redeem the honor of our nation. Where is your tax bill?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir; where is your tax bill to meet the amount of $3,000,000 for this show? They are before Congress calling for a tax bill while in the next moment they call for $3,000,000; in one hand holding out the show, and in the other a tax bill. Go to the country with that issue.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I will.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House, at this hour the committee will rise.

Mr. FRYE. Before the gentleman leaves the floor, as he has stated that I retired from my seat when he commenced his remarks, I want him to see that I was here listening to every croak uttered by him: I did not lose a croak; and I heard only the same old song I have heard him sing ever since he has been upon this floor.

Mr. DAWES. If that is any honor to the gentleman he is welcome to it. I would not take a single feather out of his eagle.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 2986) to appropriate $3,000,000 in aid of the centennial celebration and international exhibition of 1876, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate of the United States, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body withdrew its request for the return of the bill (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits, and amendatory of all acts in relation thereto.

The message further announced that that body had passed a bill (S. No. 784) authorizing a transfer of gold mint bars from the bullion fund of the assay office in New York to the assistant treasurer at New York; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

It further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 3028) granting the assent of Congress for the improvement of Wolf River, across the Menomonee Indian reservation, in the State of Wisconsin; and

An act (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. NUNN, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to print in the RECORD some remarks on the general condition of the country. (See Appendix.)

Mr. SLOSS of Alabama, and Mr. BARRERE of Illinois, were granted leave to print remarks on the centennial bill. (See Appendix.)

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, having yielded the floor to others to speak upon this centennial bill, I am compelled now, as the debate is to be closed, to ask leave to print some remarks on the subject of the international exhibition to be held in Philadelphia in 1876. As I represent the district where is located Independence Hall, from which was made in 1776 the declaration of American independence, it is fitting this debate should not go out to the world without at least something said in behalf of my constituents. I ask leave to print my remarks. (See Appendix.)

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. KELLEY. I have been requested by two gentlemen, the gentleman from California, Mr LUTTRELL, and the gentleman from Florida, Mr. WALLS, to ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD remarks they have prepared in support of this bill. (See Appendix.)

There was no objection.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLEY. I cannot consent to any amendment.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I ask the consent of the House to have the amendment read.

Mr. KELLEY. In now taking the floor to close debate, I yield my time to my friend, the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut is allowed, under the arrangement which has been made, to so much of the hour and a half as he may choose to occupy.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. If the gentleman from Connecticut will give me the opportunity, I should like to have that amendment read.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Perhaps the gentleman may have that opportunity after I have got through. I am not allowed to yield the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut will proceed.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

[Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. RICE. I want but a minute, to say that I desire the entire success of the centennial exposition. I think it should be international, and should be celebrated in Philadelphia. I think the States through their governments should appropriate something to assist the celebration. I think the people of the entire country, through their representatives here, should make an appropriation recognizing and assisting in this American jubilee. I would gladly vote for an appropriation of $1,000,000, but not more.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House now order this bill to be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I ask the clerk to read a short letter from the president of the centennial board of finance, giving an assurance that there will be no necessity for a further application for funds. I omitted to read it.

The SPEAKER. It will be read if there is no objection.

No objection was made, and the Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CENTENNIAL BOARD OF FINANCE,
Philadelphia, May 5, 1874.

DEAR SIR: The financial statements made by the centennial board of finance are based on calculations which will be rigidly adhered to; and you are at liberty to state, as authorized by the centennial board of finance, that $3,000,000 proposed as the contribution of the United States, is the only appropriation which will ever be asked for the purposes of the international exhibition of 1876 from the General Government.

JNO. WELSH,
President of the Centennial Board of Finance.

Hon. JOSEPH R. HAWLEY,
President of the United States Centennial Commission.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If unanimous consent can be given, it may be as well to have the yeas and nays taken on the final passage of the bill.

Mr. SHANKS. I prefer to have the yeas and nays taken on this question.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 92, nays 138, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Archer, Banning, Biery, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Crocker, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Darrall, Dobbins, Eames, Frye, Hancock, Harmer, Harrison, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, John W. Schumaker, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, William A. Smith, Standiford, Stephens, St. John, Charles R. Thomas, Wallace, Marcus L. Ward, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Wilber, Willie, Wood, and Woodford—60.

So the bill was not ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. HAGANS. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. KILLINGER, who if present would vote "ay," while I should vote "no."

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I am paired on this question with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MAGEE. If present he would vote in the affirmative, and I would vote in the negative.

Mr. LEACH. On this question I am paired with my colleague from North Carolina, Mr. SMITH. If here he would vote "ay," while I should vote "no."

Mr. BUCKNER. I am paired with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. STEPHENS, who if present would vote in the affirmative, while I should vote in the negative.

Mr. MORRISON. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. HERSEY, who is absent on account of sickness. If he were present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. DAVIS. I am paired with the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. LOWNDES. If present he would vote in the affirmative, and I should vote in the negative.

Mr. NIBLACK. My colleague, Mr. HOLMAN, is absent by leave of the House. If present he would vote "no."

Mr. LAMISON. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. G. F. HOAR. If present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My colleague, Mr. KASSON, who is detained from the House on account of illness, would, if here, vote "no."

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. My colleague, Mr. ST. JOHN, is absent by reason of a death in his family, and I am paired with him. If he were he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. BEGOLE. I am paired on this question with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. SHOEMAKER, who if present would vote in the affirmative, and I should vote in the negative.

Mr. SAWYER. I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. BUTLER. If present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. ORR. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. THOMAS. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. LYNCH. On this question I agreed to pair with the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. RAINEY; if he were present he would vote in the affirmative, and I should reluctantly vote in the negative.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to announce that the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MAYNARD, is paired with the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. MAYNARD, if present, would vote "ay," and Mr. BRADLEY would vote "no."

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. I wish to announce that the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX, is absent on account of sickness.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, for the purpose of recommitting the bill.

The SPEAKER. Should the House refuse to lay on the table the motion to reconsider, the question will of course recur upon that motion. On this question the Chair orders tellers; and appoints the gentleman from Maine, Mr. HALE, and his colleague, Mr. BURLEIGH.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. We may as well have the yeas and nays; it will come to that. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MOREY. Have we not the right to tellers?

The SPEAKER. The demand for the yeas and nays supersedes the vote by tellers.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 120, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bromberg, Brown, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Caldwell, Cannon, John B. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Snyder, Speer, Stanard, Stone, Storm, Stowell, Strawbridge, Swann, Sypher, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Vance, Waddell, Walls, Wells, White, Whitehead, Whitthorne, John M. S. Williams, William Williams, Wilshire, and Ephraim K. Wilson—120.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banning, Barnum, Barry, Bradley, Benjamin F. Butler, Clayton, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Crooke, Duell, Eldredge, Elliott, Herndon, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Holman, Hunton, Kasson, Kellogg, Killinger, Lamison, Lansing, Lowndes, Magee, Maynard, Mitchell, Morrison, Nesmith, Orr, Packard, Phelps, Potter, Rainey, Ellis H. Roberts, Sawyer, John G. Schumaker, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, William A. Smith, Standiford, Stephens, St. John, Charles R. Thomas, Wallace, Marcus L. Ward, Whitehouse, Wilber, Willie, Wood, Woodford, and Pierce M. B. Young—53.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

During the vote,

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina, stated that his colleague, Mr. THOMAS, was paired with Mr. ORR, who would vote in the affirmative, while his colleague would vote in the negative.

Mr. LAMISON stated that he was paired with Mr. G. F. HOAR, who if present would vote in the negative, while he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. ST. JOHN, who would vote in the negative, while he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, stated that his colleague, Mr. BRADLEY, was paired with Mr. MAYNARD, who would vote in the negative, while his colleague would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. PACKARD. I desire to say that I was suddenly called out of the House on account of serious illness in my family and was unable to return in time to vote. If I had been here a minute sooner I should have voted against laying on the table the motion to reconsider.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. KELLEY. The reconsideration is only for the commitment of the bill.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman from Maine will not insist on demanding the yeas and nays on the reconsideration.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The House voted down the measure itself, and the question is now to take all that back; therefore I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BURLEIGH. What will be the result if that is carried in the affirmative?

The SPEAKER. If carried in the affirmative, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maine on his motion to recommit.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to order the bill to be engrossed and read a third time; and there were—yeas 114, nays 112, not voting 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Archer, Atkins, Biery, Bright, Burleigh, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cason, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Comingo, Cook, Crittenden, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Darrall, Dobbins, Eames, Field, Frye, Glover, Hagans, Hancock, Harmer, Benjamin W. Harris, Harrison, Hathorn, Joseph R. Hawley, Hays, John W. Hazelton, Hodges, Hooper, Houghton, Howe, Hynes, Jewett, Kelley, Kendall, Lamar, Lamport, Lawson, Leach, Lewis, Lofland, Luttrell, Lynch, Alexander S. McDill, McJunkin, McKee, Mills, Moore, Morey, Myers, Negley, Nunn, O'Brien, O'Neill, Orth, Packer, Pelham, Pendleton, Perry, Pike, James H. Platt, jr., Purman, Randall, Ransier, Rapier, Rice, Richmond, Robbins, Ross, Scofield, Henry J. Scudder, Isaac W. Scudder, Sener, Shanks, Sheats, Sheldon, Sherwood, Sloan, Sloss, A. Herr Smith, George L. Smith, J. Ambler Smith, Snyder, Speer, Stone, Storm, Stowell, Strawbridge, Swann, Taylor, Christopher Y. Thomas, Thornburgh, Todd, Townsend, Tremain, Vance, Waddell, Walls, Wells, White, Whitthorne, John M. S. Williams, William Wilshire, and Ephraim K. Wilson—114.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Bass, Beck, Bell, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bromberg, Brown, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burrows, Caldwell, Cannon, Clements, Stepen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crossland, Danford, Dawes, DeWitt, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eden, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Garfield, Giddings, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Robert S. Hale, Hamilton, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hatcher, Havens, John B. Hawley, Gerry W. Hazelton, Hendee, Hereford, E. Rockwood Hoar, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hunter, Hunton, Hurlbut, Hyde, Knapp, Lawrence, Loughridge, Lowe, Marshall, Martin, McCrary, James W. McDill, MacDougall, McLean, McNulta, Mellish, Merriam, Milliken, Monroe, Morrison, Neal, Niblack, Niles, Page, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Phelps, Phillips, Pierce, Thomas C. Platt, Poland, Pratt, Ray, William R. Roberts, James C. Robinson, James W. Robinson, Henry B. Sayler, Milton Sayler, Sessions, Small, John Q. Smith, Southard, Sprague, Stanard, Strait, Tyner, Waldron, Jasper D. Ward, Wheeler, Whiteley, Charles W. Willard, George Willard, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Jeremiah M. Wilson, Woodworth, and John D. Young—112.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Banning, Barnum, Barry, Begole, Berry, Bradley, Buckner, Benjamin F. Butler, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Cox, Creamer, Crocker, Crooke, Davis, Duell, Eldredge, Elliott, Farwell, Herndon, Hersey, George F. Hoar, Holman, Kasson, Kellogg, Killinger, Lamison, Lansing, Lowndes, Magee, Maynard, Mitchell, Nesmith, Orr, Packard, Parsons, Potter, Rainey, Read, Ellis H. Roberts, Rusk, Sawyer, John G. Schumaker, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Smart, H. Boardman Smith, William A. Smith, Standiford, Starkweather, Stephens, St. John, Sypher, Charles R. Thomas, Wallace, Marcus L. Ward, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Wilber, Willie, Wolfe, Wood, Woodford, and Pierce M. B. Young—64.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina. I desire to state that Mr. ORR is paired with my colleague, Mr. THOMAS, of North Carolina. On this question Mr. ORR would vote "no," and Mr. THOMAS "ay."

Mr. LEACH. I was paired on this question with my colleague, Mr. SMITH, but not on this particular vote. I vote "ay."

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I am paired with Mr. MAGEE, of Pennsylvania. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. PACKARD. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. WOLFE. If he were here he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. ST. JOHN. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. MAYNARD is paired with Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. MAYNARD would vote "ay," and Mr. BRADLEY "no."

Mr. NUNN. I desire to change my vote. I am not in favor of the bill, but for the gratification of personal friends I vote "ay" on this particular question.

Mr. NEGLEY. There is a great deal of nobility in that utterance.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I now move that the bill be recommitted to the Select Committee on the Centennial Celebration.

Mr. BECK. I move to amend that motion by substituting the Committee on Appropriations. There the bill ought to go. I call for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 15 voting in the affirmative; and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Pending the motion to recommit, I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. And on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 105, noes 62.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, called for the yeas and nays.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 14; not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were refused, and the motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee: The petition of Jacob H. Hybarger of Greene County, Tennessee, for arrears of soldier's pay, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, the petition of Mary L. Rodner and Caroline Keho, of Shelby County, Tennessee, to be reimbursed for damages to their property by United States troops, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CLYMER: The petition of the employés of Pine Iron Works, Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the second section of the act of June 6, 1872, which reduced by 10 per cent. the duties on certain commodities, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. DARRALL: The petition of the heirs of J. B. V. Richard, to be paid for twenty-four bales of cotton, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FARWELL: The petition of Margaret Pattison, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HALE, of New York: The memorial of journeymen printers of Washington, District of Columbia, protesting against the passage of the Senate bill to further regulate the Government Printing Office and to reduce the wages of printers, to the Committee on Printing.

Also, the memorial of journeymen pressmen of Washington, District of Columbia, of similar import, to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. LAWRENCE: The petition of bankers and business men of Cincinnati, Pittsburgh, and other cities, for the passage of a law requiring the Secretary of the Treasury, in the manufacture of future Government issues, to conform to the plan recommended by the Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment, March 3, 1869, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of John Pope, late private Company K, Eighty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH, of Ohio: The petition of John W. Keys, that a pension be granted to Matthew B. Whitacre, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TREMAIN: The petition of John Englander, late of the Fifty-second New York Volunteers, for relief, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts: The petition of John P. Squire & Co. and others, of Boston, for the exception of swine from the provisions of the bill (H. R. No. 2650) to regulate the transportation of animals by railroad, to the Committee on Agriculture.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 8, 1874.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WASHBURN presented a memorial of merchants, ship-owners, and ship-masters of Gloucester, Massachusetts, in favor of the present system of compulsory pilotage; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of the owners of the schooner Jennie Spear, registered at the port of New York, praying that the name of that vessel be changed to Santa Rosa; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SARGENT presented a petition of citizens of California, claiming title to the ex-mission of San Buenaventura; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, the following resolutions, submitted by Mr. Sumner on the 1st of December, 1873, were taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas by international law and existing custom war is recognized as a form of trial for the determination of differences between nations; and whereas for generations good men have protested against the irrational character of this arbitrament, where force instead of justice prevails, and have anxiously sought for a substitute in the nature of a judicial tribunal, all of which was expressed by Franklin in his exclamation, "When will mankind be convinced that all wars are follies, very expensive and very mischievous, and agree to settle their differences by arbitration?" and whereas war, once prevailed in the determination of differences between individuals, between cities, between counties, and between provinces, being recognized in all these cases as the arbiter of justice, but at last yielded to a judicial tribunal, and now, in the progress of civilization, the time has come for the extension of this humane principle to nations, so that their differences may be taken from the arbitrament of war, and, in conformity with these examples, submitted to a judicial tribunal; and whereas arbitration has been formally recognized as a substitute for war in the determination of differences between nations, being especially recommended by the congress of Paris, where were assembled the representatives of England, France, Russia, Prussia, Austria, Sardinia, and Turkey, and afterward adopted by the United States in formal treaty with Great Britain for the determination of differences arising from depredations of British cruisers, and also from opposing claims with regard to the San Juan boundary; and whereas it becomes important to consider and settle the true character of this beneficent tribunal, thus commended and adopted, so that its authority and completeness as a substitute for war may not be impaired, but strengthened and upheld, to the end that civilization may be advanced and war be limited in its sphere: Therefore,

Resolved, That in the determination of international differences arbitration should become a substitute for war in reality as in name, and, therefore, co-extensive with war in jurisdiction, so that any question or grievance which might be the occasion of war or of misunderstanding between nations should be considered by this tribunal.

Resolved, That the United States, having at heart the cause of peace everywhere, and hoping to help its permanent establishment between nations, hereby recommend the adoption of arbitration as a just and practical method for the determination of international differences, to be maintained sincerely and in good faith, so that war may cease to be regarded as a proper form of trial between nations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 729) to enable Indians to become citizens of the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 650) explanatory of the resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of settlers upon the absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas," approved April 7, 1869, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Commodore Edward Middleton, praying compensation for property taken by the United States troops in South Carolina during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was adopted, and ordered to be printed.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. PATTERSON, it was Ordered, That the bill (H. R. No. 2353) granting a pension to Lucy Ann Cummings be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARVEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 792) for the relief of John Fletcher, surviving partner of Fletcher & Powell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAMLIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 793) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to change the name of the schooner Jennie Spear to that of Santa Rosa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CARPENTER (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 794) to legalize the muster of Reuben M. Pratt as second lieutenant; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 795) for the relief of Augustin Olvara; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

DISTRICT POLICE COURT.

Mr. CARPENTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire whether section 3 of an act to establish a police court for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, approved June 17, 1870, in so far as it denies a trial by jury, be constitutional, and to report by bill or otherwise.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

REMOVAL OF CHARGE OF MUTINY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bills on the Calendar will now be taken up in their order, if there be no further morning business.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 345) to relieve certain persons therein named, late members of Company K, Fifty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, from the charge of mutiny; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM F. KERR.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1404) for the relief of William F. Kerr; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to William F. Kerr, of Indiana, a private soldier in Company D, Third Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Cavalry, the sum of $131.50, in full for one horse and equipments owned and abandoned by him by order of the officer in command at Dinwiddie Court-House, Virginia, on the 25th of June, 1864, on a forced march, by which the horse and equipments were totally lost to the soldier.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALBERT VON STEINHOUSEN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 305) for the relief of Albert von Steinhousen, late major Sixty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The proper accounting officers of the Treasury are directed by the bill to allow and pay to Albert von Steinhousen, late major of the Sixty-eighth Regiment of New York Volunteer Infantry, the full pay of his rank from the 22d of August, 1862, to the 8th of August, 1863, deducting therefrom all pay that he may have received for any portion of that period.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES C. LIVINGSTON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 725) for the relief of James C. Livingston, late a private in Company E, Third Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that James C. Livingston, late a private in Company E, Third Iowa Regiment of Volunteer Infantry, shall be entitled to an honorable discharge from the service of the United States, to date July 22, 1865, the date of the final muster of his regiment, and shall be entitled to his back-pay and bounty and shall be restored to all homestead and other rights, as fully and completely as though he had been honorably mustered out of the service with his regiment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE YOUNT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1776) for the relief of George Yount; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Paymaster-General of the Army to pay to George Yount, late a second lieutenant of Company I, Third Missouri Volunteer Infantry, a sum equal to the pay and emoluments of a second lieutenant of infantry, from the 1st of September, 1863, to the 7th of March, 1864, deducting whatever pay he may have received for that period.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM A. SNODGRASS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2094) for the relief of William A. Snodgrass, late lieutenant Company H, Thirty-ninth Regiment Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to pay to William A. Snodgrass, late lieutenant Company H, Thirty-ninth Regiment Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry, his pay and allowances as second lieutenant from March 30, 1865, to July 9, 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABSALOM BAIRD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 529) to authorize the appointment in the Inspector-General's Department of Major Absalom Baird as lieutenant-colonel and assistant inspector-general; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that a vacancy of lieutenant-colonel in the Inspector-General's Department of the Army originated on the 13th of June, 1867, to which Major Absalom Baird was entitled to be promoted under the laws then in existence, but from which he was excluded by reason of another appointment in that department previously made; and that an act of Congress approved June 8, 1872, was passed with the intention of rectifying this wrong, but has failed to secure to Major Baird his just rights. The bill therefore authorizes the President to nominate and promote Absalom Baird to be lieutenant-colonel and assistant inspector-general, to date from June 13, 1867.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported the bill with an amendment to add thereto the following:

But no pay or allowance shall be made to him for any time prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does that bill come from the Military Committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the bill creates a new office.

Mr. LOGAN. That bill is entirely correct. In the promotions that were made, though Mr. Baird had rights under the law, for some reason or other he did not get the benefit of them, but the place was given to General Davis. We reported this bill in order to correct the promotions in the line of that staff department.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does this authorize him to succeed to a vacancy, or does it put him in a new office?

Mr. LOGAN. There is no vacancy now; he is already in that department, and the bill gives him the right he was entitled to at the time the promotion was made over him. That is all. It has been examined by the Secretary of War and others, and it is admitted that that was the fact.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

E. & J. KOCH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 552) to refund to E. & J. Koch certain customs duties; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized by the bill to refund to Messrs. E. & J. Koch $2,916.65, gold, being the amount paid by them in the New Orleans customs district on an importation of machinery for the manufacture of beet-root sugar in the year 1873.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report in that case read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. FENTON on the 25th of March:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 552) to refund to E. & J. Koch certain customs duties, beg leave to report:

That the papers in the case establish that Messrs. Koch, acting under the authority conferred under section 2 of joint resolution of March 2, 1867, imported, in the year 1873, certain machinery for the manufacture of beet-sugar. It seems, however, that the importers had in view also the application of the machinery to the manufacture of sugar from cane. Upon the presentation of the case to the Secretary of the Treasury for refund of duties, as provided under the joint resolution of 1867, to which reference has been made, it was not claimed that the machinery was imported solely for the manufacture of beet-sugar. So, in a technical sense, the refund proposed could not be allowed under the provisions of that act; but, in the judgment of the committee, the importation was in the spirit of the act, having like object, namely, the increase of production and the lessened cost of sugar, as well as being within the general policy of our legislation for the introduction of machinery to improve the processes of production and manufacture.

Supported by the following letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, appended as a part of this report, the committee reach the conclusion that the relief set forth ought to be granted, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., March 10, 1874.

SIR: I am in receipt of a letter from the clerk of your committee inclosing Senate bill No. 552, with accompanying papers, for the refund to Messrs. E. & J. Koch of certain customs duties paid by them at the port of New Orleans, on machinery imported into that port for the manufacture of sugar, in the year 1873, and stating that the committee desire my opinion in relation to its passage, with any additional facts the Department may have concerning the matter.

In reply I have to state that a claim for the refund of these duties was presented to the Department by one of the parties interested in the month of October, 1873, under section 2 of the joint resolution of March 2, 1867, which provides that from and after the passage thereof, machinery for the manufacture of beet-sugar, and imported for that purpose solely, shall be exempt from duty.

It appeared upon investigation that the machinery in question was of the kind generally used for the manufacture of beet-root sugar, but that the special object in view in importing it into the United States was to make experiments in the manufacture of sugar from the sugar-cane, and therefore the Department was compelled to deny the application for refund, as the machinery was not imported solely for the purpose of manufacturing beet-root sugar.

It seems to me quite as desirable to develop the production of sugar from the cane as from the beet; and as it is claimed that the machinery in question is able to produce a much larger amount of sugar from the same quantity of cane than by the ordinary process, I think the spirit of the law before referred to would sanction the passage of the present bill.

I have the honor, therefore, to recommend it to the favorable consideration of the Committee on Finance. Returning the papers submitted,

I am, very respectfully,

WILLIAM A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary.

Hon. R. E. FENTON, United States Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SHOSHONE INDIANS IN WYOMING.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 604) to confirm an agreement made with the Shoshone Indians (eastern band) for the purchase of the south part of their reservation in Wyoming Territory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

Mr. BOGY. I hope this bill will not be laid aside. It can be explained in less than half a minute. It is of very great importance to that Territory. The bill has passed through the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I hope it will be acted upon. There will be difficulties if this thing is not done at an early day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Vermont does not withdraw his objection, the next bill will be reported.

LEMUEL D. EVANS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 625) for the relief of Lemuel D. Evans, late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Texas.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there is a report in that case I should like to hear it read.

Mr. SCOTT. That is a case which is reported by a majority of the Committee on Claims. There was some dissent; and as the report is of some length, I think the bill had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

R. W. CLARKE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2086) for the relief of R. W. Clarke, postmaster at Brattleborough, Vermont; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit R. W. Clarke, postmaster at Brattleborough, Vermont, in his account as such postmaster, with $1,312.87, being the amount of postage-stamps and postal money-order funds stolen from the safe of that post-office by burglars, on the 24th of November, 1873, without fault or negligence on the part of the postmaster.

Mr. SARGENT. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, in the House of Representatives, February 20, 1874:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 495) for the relief of R. W. Clarke, postmaster at Brattleborough, Vermont, have had the same under consideration, and now make the following report:

It appears that the post-office at Brattleborough, which is kept in a brick building known as the Town-hall, was entered by burglars on the night of the 24th of November, 1873, the strong brick vault in which the stamps and funds of the post-office were securely locked was broken open by breaking the iron door thereof, and all of the valuables stolen. These facts are sustained by the affidavits of the postmaster and of his two clerks, and also of numerous citizens and business men of Brattleborough; also the fact that vigorous efforts were made by the postmaster to capture the robbers, without success. The good character and habitual vigilance of the postmaster and of his two clerks are sworn to by numerous citizens. The postmaster and the two clerks all testify under oath that there were in the vault at the time of the robbery, and carried away by the robbers, postage-stamps to the value of $1,037.26, and money-order funds to the amount of $275.61. The special agent of the Department, who visited the place and investigated the circumstances of the case, reports in a letter to this committee that the office was broken and robbed, as stated in the petition, evidently by professional burglars, and that the books of the office showed $275.61 in money-order funds then on hand. A letter from the Superintendent of the money-order office, dated February 10, 1874, also makes the same statement in reference to amount of money-order funds. A letter from the third Assistant Postmaster-General, dated February 11, 1874, estimates the amount of stamps and stamped envelopes on hand at the office in Brattleborough, November 24, 1873, at $1,794.99.

Your committee find that the loss occurred without any negligence on the part of the said postmaster or of his clerks, and that the amount of stamps and money-order funds, as stated in the petition, were stolen; and they therefore report back the bill, with the accompanying substitute therefor, and recommend that it be adopted.

Mr. SARGENT. Is that the report of the House committee or the Senate committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House committee.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire whether the Senate committee themselves are fully satisfied with these conclusions. It is rather a dangerous practice to legislate to pay money alleged to be stolen in the hands of a public officer, whether on the highway as in the case in Texas, or from a safe as in this case in Vermont. I think we ought to have some explanation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. Unless some explanation is made beside the House report, I shall object.

Mr. RAMSEY. This case was investigated very closely by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate, and on a thorough examination they thought it a case in which the Senate would be justified in concurring with the House in relieving this postmaster. There are many Senators who imagine, doubtless, that there is a great deal of liberality on the part of this committee; and yet after all you have only acted upon about fifteen cases, and the aggregate does not amount to over $5,000. When you consider that there are nearly thirty-five thousand postmasters in the United States liable to lose their funds in one way or another, it is certainly a very moderate reimbursement.

Mr. SARGENT. Did the Senate committee hear any witnesses in this case, or simply take the House report?

Mr. RAMSEY. All the evidence that we usually examine into in such cases we had before us. We had communications of the Post-Office Department, communications from the special agent of the Department, &c.

Mr. MORRILL of Vermont. I have not particularly examined this case; but I know the party. The postmaster there is a very worthy man, who was a soldier in the war, a major, I believe. He and his subordinates are entirely trustworthy, so far as their character is concerned; and the claim rests upon the same principle with all similar bills that have been reported by the Post-Office Committee, a dozen of which at least have been passed by the Senate at this session.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from Vermont in the last sentence which he uttered has expressed about what it was my purpose to say when I rose with him and he was awarded the floor. The evidence in this case shows that the office was robbed; shows that the safe was blown open; that the postmaster immediately gave notice to the Postmaster-General, and the Postmaster-General sent a special agent upon the ground to investigate into the matter, and he reported upon it; and upon that report, and upon the evidence of the loss approved and corroborated by the statement from the Post-Office Department here where there is a check, the committee reported the bill precisely in accordance with the rule which we have adopted of paying postmasters in cases where we believe they have been robbed, the postmasters in the mean time exercising due care, as we believe the postmaster did in this case.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The committee usually act upon the affidavits of parties and such proof as satisfies them that the parties have been guilty of no negligence. I suppose that to be true of this particular case, though I do not remember the deliberations of the committee on it, but I call attention to the fact that it is a very loose way of doing business to relieve public officers, whether postmasters or paymasters or any other class of officers, because it invites to carelessness and to injury to the public service. I believe that the cases reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads fall within the rule that has been acted upon in the Senate; but I ask whether it is not time that the Senate should consider whether that rule itself is a proper one, whether there ought not to be strict accountability required of every officer; because, when it comes to be understood that a public officer, whether a paymaster or postmaster or anybody else, who has suffered loss is to be relieved by coming to the Senate, it will invite, in my opinion, to carelessness on the part of public officers who have the care and custody of public money. Therefore I think it is time that we had revised this rule. It is time that we had taken into serious consideration whether we ought not to hold to strict accountability, and in no case relieve a party who, having charge and custody of public money, has suffered loss by robbery or burglary. It is his duty to take care of the money; his duty to see that no loss occurs. There may be individual hardships from applying a rigid, iron rule; but I apprehend that the public money would be better taken care of if we adopted some rule that would hold to the strictest responsibility every public officer who has the custody of public money.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I agree entirely with the Senator from Delaware. This claim is a small one; and if the Senate chooses to reverse its action upon all the cases it has acted on at this session, (and we remember of course that there have been more than a dozen cases of exactly the same import to this bill which have been passed,) be it so. I only know that in this case the parties are excellent officers, and they are wholly trustworthy; but if the Senate chooses, on this small claim of a few hundred dollars, to reverse its policy and take different action, I would as soon it should begin with Vermont as any other State. But I desire to say that if this policy is adopted on this bill, I shall hope that Senators will maintain the symmetry of their record hereafter.

Mr. BOGY. I hope this bill will go over. I do not think the time should be taken up in discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is now too late to object.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, I admire the vigilance of Senators; but the day has not arrived, nor will it arrive during the existence of this Government, when perfection will be reached, and for the next thousand years, I take it, whenever a meritorious case is presented the committee who act upon it, investigating it closely and finding to their satisfaction that relief should be had, it will be given, I care not what strictures may be enacted by law or otherwise. As a member of the committee from which this bill was reported, I can say that we regularly investigate all questions of this kind, and we endeavor to mete out justice to the parties liberally. Sometimes perhaps we go too far; sometimes we reject claims. We do that which we think is correct; and when we thus do, I am always ready to stand by the report. We converse in committee just as my friend, the Senator from Delaware who has come down now with the iron rule, would have us do; we canvass these matters there regularly. He thinks this system has gone far enough and should stop; but it never will stop. It is the nature of legislation. That is what we are here for, to mete out justice and to relieve applicants whenever their case is meritorious. I have no doubt about this being meritorious from the evidence before us. I supported it in committee, and I shall support it here.

Mr. ALCORN. I have not at any time supported a proposition like that under consideration, nor shall I. When a public officer undertakes the discharge of a duty like this, when he comes to take charge of public money, he does it for a certain consideration. A certain consideration is given to the public officer, and he undertakes the performance of certain duties and enters into a bond the conditions of which are that he is faithfully to perform the services required and account for the public moneys that may come into his hands. The courts have universally held that they will not render relief in any case like that now under consideration. If appeals like this are to be made to the Legislature, and the Congress of the United States is to continue to relieve parties who come here with proofs which are ex parte in their nature and character, what will be the result? Who outside is going to come forward and make proof if even he may suspect or know that there is fraud connected with the transaction? It is the business of no one; so that in truth and in fact the examinations are in their nature ex parte. Such legislation on the part of Congress exercises a pernicious influence on the legislation of the different States. The States look to Congress as a type of that justice which should be rendered in cases of this kind. Legislation of this sort will put to hazard the whole public revenues of this nation. Without any imputation upon the case at bar, I may say that combinations and conspiracies will be continually formed in this nation for the purpose of robbing the Government of its rightful treasure. If a public officer for a consideration comes forward and executes his bond for the discharge of his duties, I am in favor of holding him to the conditions of that bond strictly, and rendering him no relief save and except that relief which the courts of the country are ready to afford. Rather than that this legislation should go forward, I would say, amend the law and provide that the parties may go into court, and let the matter be there adjudicated by a court of equity; and if equity exists and the right demands, let the party be relieved. If we allow these cases to be disposed of here on ex parte examinations, does not every Senator know, however honest these applicants may be—and I would not impute to these parties any dishonesty—that combinations can be formed and the Government year after year robbed of its public treasure?

I shall vote against this bill, as I have voted against every bill of like character. I say to the public officer, Stand to your bond, and if you are afraid to meet the responsibilities which your bond imposes, then give way and let somebody else take the office that you propose to discharge.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, is it too late to call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

M'CLINTOCK YOUNG.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 555) for the relief of McClintock Young, of the State of Maryland; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the extension of the patent of McClintock Young, of Frederick, Maryland, for an improvement in harvesting-machines, dated June 28, 1873, and numbered 24598, and signed by the Commissioner of Patents on the 28th of June, 1873, shall have the same binding effect in law as though the extension was signed by the Commissioner of Patents and bore date the 27th day of June, 1873.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAMER BIENVILLE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1201) authorizing the payment of prize-money to the officers and crew of the United States steamer Bienville; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary of the Navy is authorized by the bill to direct the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow and pay to such persons as were the officers and composed the crew of the United States steamer Bienville, on the 5th day of August, 1864, a sum equal to that which the officers and crew of that steamer would have been entitled to receive as prize-money had the name of that steamer been inserted in the list of the vessels entitled to share in the captures made in the bay of Mobile on the 5th of August, 1864, the name of the vessel having been accidentally omitted from the list; the sum to be paid out of the naval-pension fund.

Mr. WRIGHT. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not.

Mr. SARGENT. There is no report; but the facts are stated very distinctly in the bill. It was carefully examined by the Committee on Naval Affairs. We had before us the testimony of the officers, Farragut and others, and the opinion of the Navy Department. In our judgment this steamer was omitted originally simply by mistake, and we recommend that it be put on the footing of other vessels with which it shared in a hazardous undertaking.

Mr. WRIGHT. I called attention to the bill from the fact that I saw that the chairman of the committee who reported it was not present, and I did not know that any one was prepared to make an explanation.

Mr. SARGENT. I am on the committee.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the Senator from California makes the explanation for the committee.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POWDER MAGAZINE AT NORFOLK.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 83) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to remove the powder-magazine from Fort Norfolk, Virginia; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

URIAH FORREST.

The bill (S. No. 629) for the relief of Osceola C. Green, administrator de bonis non and one of the heirs at law of Lieutenant-Colonel Uriah Forrest, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to settle with Osceola C. Green, administrator de bonis non and one of the heirs at law of Lieutenant-Colonel Uriah Forrest, of the Maryland Line of the Army of the Revolution, for the half-pay for life due to Lieutenant-Colonel Forrest under the resolve of October 21, 1780, from the end of the revolutionary war to the time of his death, July 8, 1805.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEZ PERCÉ RESERVATION IN IDAHO.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 630) to authorize the purchase of six hundred and forty acres of land in the Territory of Idaho for the Nez Percé Indian reservation.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Is there any report with that bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

Mr. BOGY. That is a meritorious bill.

MARY J. BLOOD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1948) granting a pension to Mary J. Blood; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary of the Interior is directed by the bill to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary J. Blood, widow of Emory A. Blood, late private in Company D, Eleventh Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, and to pay her a pension of eight dollars a month, commencing at the death of Emory A. Blood, on the 13th of November, 1868.

The Committee on Pensions reported the bill with an amendment to strike out the words "commencing at the death of said Emory A. Blood, on the 13th of November, 1868."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JULIET E. HALL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1945) granting a pension to Juliet E. Hall, daughter of William Hall, late colonel of the Eleventh Regiment of Iowa Infantry; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Juliet E. Hall, daughter of William Hall, late a colonel of the Eleventh Regiment of Iowa Infantry, commencing November 11, 1869, the date of the remarriage of the widow.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD JARDINE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2356) granting a pension to Edward Jardine, late colonel and brevet brigadier-general United States Volunteers; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Edward Jardine, late brevet-brigadier United States Volunteers, at the rate of thirty dollars per month.

The Committee on Pensions reported the bill with an amendment which was to strike out the last clause of the bill, as follows:

And in the case of the death of the said Edward Jardine, the amount of pension allowed by this act shall be continued to his widow or minor children, under the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE YELLOWSTONE PARK.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 581) amendatory of and supplementary to the act entitled "An act to set apart a certain tract of land lying near the headwaters of the Yellowstone River as a public park," approved March 1, 1872.

The bill proposes to amend the second section of the act of March 1, 1872, by striking out the words "ten years" and inserting the words "twenty years." It also empowers the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to grant leases for toll-roads throughout the park wherever roads have not been constructed by the United States; and he is to prescribe and regulate the rates of toll to be charged on such roads.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the same sort of bill that were committed yesterday. I think it had better be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions to report the bill complete.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the bill be recommitted to the committee, for the purpose of having it in a different form.

Mr. OGLESBY. What is the objection to the bill?

Mr. ANTHONY. The objection is that nobody can understand what it is unless he takes two acts together and pieces them—the same objection that existed to the bill which we discussed yesterday in regard to distilled spirits. I have no objection to the bill; but I think now, as we are about to have the laws revised and brought down to the beginning of this year, we ought to stop this kind of legislation—amending a law by saying that certain words in a previous act, which you have to turn to the statutes to find, shall be stricken out and certain other words put in. This bill should be reported in full; at least the amended part of it. I am sure the Senator from Illinois will agree with me in that. I have no objection to the bill itself.

Mr. OGLESBY. I have no objection particularly to correcting the bill so as to put it in the most convenient form, but I had not supposed that our committee was the one to undertake the subject of the revision of the laws. This amendment of the law of 1872 is proposed in the usual form, but I do not know that the Senate will approve the object of it. It is just as well to take the sense of the Senate on the bill now as at any time. There is no use in referring it back and having it reported again and then put on the Calendar. The Secretary of the Interior asked for an appropriation for the Yellowstone Park. The committee considered the subject and thought it was better to take some step in that direction now or else substantially abandon the park. The amount asked for was $100,000. We finally placed it at the figure of $25,000. It is necessary to fix the boundaries of the park. It has not been surveyed. Settlers are going in, or are anxious to go in, and the question of fixing the boundaries becomes important. Therefore the committee agreed with the recommendations of the Secretary of the Interior and superintendent of the park, that some steps should be taken to fix the boundaries, and then to permit private persons to construct roads leading to the objects of interest in the park at their own cost, but under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior. Of this appropriation part is to be put in trust in the hands of the superintendent, twelve or fifteen thousand dollars, to secure the establishment of the boundaries of the park, and the additional sum is to pay for the necessary watching and guarding there until the Congress of the United States shall decide whether it will take care of it and preserve it as a park or whether it will abandon it. So the committee thought it was better to bring the subject before the Senate. None of them have any special interest in it or any special desire about it. The superintendent in charge has the matter very much at heart. The Secretary of the Interior also considers the matter of public concern. To bring the question before Congress we presented the bill with the amount of the appropriation reduced from $100,000 to $25,000, to take the sense of the Senate on the subject. Now, if it is not the sense of the Senate to make an appropriation for this purpose at all, it might as well be determined now as to send the bill back merely for the purpose of reconstructing it in compliance with the expected revision of the statute laws of the nation. If the Senate would as soon express a decision upon it now as hereafter I would rather they should do so now.

Mr. SARGENT. Is an objection to the present consideration of the bill now in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. SARGENT. I make objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator allow me to say, in reply to the Senator from Illinois, that I agree to all that he has said? I think there ought to be an appropriation to preserve this park, but I think it ought to be expressed in a bill which can be understood when it is promulgated. That is all. I am in favor of the bill as I understand it, but I do not want the bill to be made up out of two acts, so that you have to get the statute-book and turn to one volume to find one act and another volume to find the other, and then put the two together and write out the result, to know what it means.

Mr. SARGENT. I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island; I think his reasoning is excellent; and I also object to the policy of the bill. I do not think we ought to make an appropriation for this purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is out of order. The bill has been passed over under objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator object to having it recommitted?

Mr. SARGENT. No; I do not object to recommitting it.

Mr. CONKLING. Let it be recommitted.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not object to that if it can be done without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to recommitting?

Mr. OGLESBY. I want to state, if the Chair will indulge me, that there is but one little bill in this world on that subject, and that is not as long as the remarks of the Senator from Rhode Island. That is all the law there is on it, and that provided for leases of ten years. They cannot make them for that time, and this simply changes the term from ten to twenty years. It is one little law that we propose to amend, which any Senator could find in three or four weeks by diligent search.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think it is any recommendation of a bill that it is not as long as a Congressman's speech.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask permission to make one remark to my honorable friend from Illinois. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws is about to report to the Senate the laws as revised, constituting one volume. That volume will hereafter, unless it is a failure, serve the Senator and everybody else in the place of the seventeen volumes of statutes now existing. In that one volume there will be no such number of section and line as these bills refer to; and therefore, in addition to all that the Senator from Rhode Island has said, we are virtually setting a trap and hiding away these provisions where no man can find them, even if he is, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] said yesterday, a mathematician and with plenty of time to sit down and calculate where the amendment was probably intended to come in. The revision of the laws, if it is to warrant the large sum of money and of labor expended upon it, is to supersede the long shelf full of ponderous volumes in which the statutes are now published; and to refer to acts as they stand now, to sections as they are numbered now, and to lines as they occur in sections now, and to amendments, will be very much to legislate after the manner of that ancient tyrant who hung his laws so high that the people could not read them.

I know that my friend from Illinois is opposed to hanging laws or anything else very high, and therefore I hope that he will allow this bill to go back to the committee and let us persevere in this way with every bill for a short time, and then all our committees will fall into the usage of adapting legislation to our present need. I think it should always have been so; but my present suggestion is to remind the Senate that the necessity is now inexorable unless we are going to lose in advance a large part of the value of our revised statutes.

Mr. OGLESBY. I will not object to the recommitment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to recommitting this bill to the Committee on Public Lands? The Chair hears none, and the recommittal is ordered.

THE GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 7, being the Geneva award bill, of which I gave notice yesterday.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator who has charge of this bill deems it his duty to proceed with it to-day I shall not make any opposition; but I would suggest to him, in view of the remarks he made yesterday—and no one could put them better—the desirableness of giving an hour to the Calendar and going on with unobjected cases, whereby we not only render justice to a great many parties, but save of the labor of committees which will be lost if we lose the present opportunity. Very soon we shall have the appropriation bills, and that will be the end of the Calendar. I think if we could have an hour, from now until two o'clock, and then go on with the Geneva bill, it would accomplish a great deal of good. I submit it, however, entirely to the pleasure of the Senator from Vermont. I shall not oppose his motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I certainly do not wish to interpose this bill or anything else against the will of the Senate; but if we owe anything to the people who are interested in this bill in the way of justice or generosity, we ought speedily to take the step which is to do that justice or generosity. We have now been sitting here for five months and done nothing in respect to a class of people in whom all branches of the Government agree that there is a meritorious right. That being the state of the case, and we being under some reproach for not having provided for them last year, although it was not the fault of the Senate, I do think it my duty to ask the Senate to pass this bill, and to pass it now in some form or other, so that we may be sure that if there is any delay or fault it will not be at our doors.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to give notice that as soon as this bill and the civil-rights bill, which I suppose are unfinished business, are disposed of, I shall move to take up House bill No. 1572, to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceed to consider the bill (S. No. 7) for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) There are some amendments reported to the bill from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. THURMAN. I suppose there will be no objection to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They will be reported.

The first amendment of the committee was in section 6, line 2, to insert after the word "Columbia" the words "or his deputies;" so as to make the section read:

That the marshal of the United States for the District of Columbia, or his deputies, shall serve all process issued by said court, preserve order in the place of sitting, and execute the orders of the said court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 10, line 25, to insert the word "proper" before the word "courts," and after the word "Territory," in the twenty-sixth line, to insert the words "or District of Columbia;" so that the clause will read:

And shall be liable to indictment and trial in the district or circuit court of the United States for the district in which such perjury shall have been committed, or in the proper courts of the United States for the Territory or District of Columbia in which such perjury shall have been committed, and shall, upon conviction, suffer such punishment as is provided by the laws of the United States for that offense.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 14, line 15, to strike out the proviso after the word "provided," in the following words:

Always, That no such payment shall be made until the Government of the United States shall have received from that of Great Britain the sum awarded to be paid by the latter to the former, in virtue of the decision and award made at Geneva, on the 14th day of September, 1872, by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the said treaty: And provided further.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 14, line 30, to strike out, after the word "Treasury," the words "in virtue of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The word "shall," in the twenty-ninth line of that section, should also be stricken out; so as to read: such "moneys as have been received into the Treasury."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out of section 15, after the word "that," in the first line, the following words:

So soon as the money which has been awarded by the tribunal of arbitration organized under the first article of the treaty aforesaid, to be paid by Great Britain to the United States, shall have been paid, the same shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and, to the extent that it shall be necessary to pay the same as herein provided, shall be reserved as a special fund for the payment of said judgments and the reimbursement of expenses as is herein expressed.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Upon the payment, from time to time, of the said respective judgments of said court, as before provided, the bonds of the United States mentioned in the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain," shall be canceled and extinguished to the amount of such payments, and when all such payments shall have been made, any such bonds remaining shall be also canceled and extinguished.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported by the Committee on the Judiciary have now been disposed of.

Mr. THURMAN. I move to strike out, in section 12, the clause beginning with the thirteenth line and ending with the word "loss," in line 22.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator be kind enough to withdraw that for a moment? A mere verbal amendment, which has substance, too, is suggested by the Senator from California [Mr. HAGER] in another place, which he will propose.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly; I withdraw my motion for the present.

Mr. HAGER. On page 6, section 11, line 13, after the word "be," I move to insert the words "verified by the oath of the claimant and;" so that the clause will read:

And all claims provable or to be allowed under this act shall be verified by the oath of the claimant and filed in said court within six months, &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no objection to that amendment. The committee understood that it was covered by another section; but it is better to have it perfectly understood.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER. In section 5 I perceive that a counsel is provided for, but I do not see any provision for his salary. Although provision is made in section 15 for the payment of judges and officers, no amount is fixed as the salary to be allowed for the counsel who may be appointed to appear in behalf of the United States before this board of commissioners. I presume there ought to be some allowance specified in section 5 as compensation for the services of the counsel who may be appointed. I will not undertake to specify that amount; I leave it to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will explain, as I was going to do, the general provisions of the bill before my friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] moves his important amendment. I will state as to section 5 and the counsel that the committee were of opinion last year, and are yet, that the proper course in such a case to pursue is the one which has been always pursued in such cases, I believe; and that is, inasmuch as it is impossible to know the extent and value and necessity of the services of counsel, how long he would be required to be engaged, how difficult and delicate his duties might be, until they had been performed, that the statute ought not to fix the compensation, but it ought to be left to the Executive and the proper Department, as in other cases of that character, to provide a reasonable compensation for the services actually performed. That led the committee to provide in the usual way that the President, of course acting through the State Department, might employ such counsel as should be necessary, and pay him such money as Congress should choose to appropriate finally for that purpose, as we should have the final control over it. Therefore I do not think the committee would be willing to have the precise sum which should be paid to counsel fixed in this bill, and for the reason that I have stated, that it is impossible to fix a precise sum in advance. It ought to be the ordinary question of service and reward, which can only be determined after the event or at the time of it, and subject of course to the final power of Congress to refuse to appropriate any more than they think under the circumstances is just.

With the permission of my friend from Ohio, who gave way with his amendment, I will state for the information of Senators who have entered this body since the Senate considered this bill a year ago briefly what the substance of the bill is. It establishes a tribunal which is called a court, but is really a board of commissioners, composed of five members, to be selected by the President and approved by the Senate, to hear the class of claims which the United States according to this bill think it is incumbent upon their sense of justice, or generosity, or duty to provide for; and it requires these commissioners to proceed with dispatch to examine into the merit of each one of the claims that may be referred to it for injuries occasioned by the particular vessels in respect to which the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva made an award against the government of Great Britain and in favor of ours, which award has been paid.

Then, besides the ordinary machinery of carrying that out, when you come to the class of persons whom, according to this bill, it is the duty of the United States to provide for, the bill defines that class of persons to be those who were the proprietors of the particular vessels that were destroyed within this period of time and by these cruisers and their tenders, or of their cargoes, or seamen's or officers' wages or apparel, and all that sort of thing. It then excludes from claim before this commission the class of people who suffered from confederate cruisers and whose injuries the tribunal of arbitration concluded had not been occasioned by any alliance or assistance that the government of Great Britain had with or rendered to the confederate service and the confederate cause; and it also provides that the insurers of these vessels for which allowance may be made shall not stand in the place of the insured if they have paid him and taken the sum which he otherwise would have had, if they insured as they must have done, in order to be entitled to all, upon a war risk and received a war premium and profited on the whole out of that line of business.

Mr. HOWE. Why should they not?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was going to tell you why. The Senator from Wisconsin, in the natural eagerness which he always has for a why asks me why? I answer as I answered perhaps the Senator himself a year ago, that this is the reason: The claim which we made upon Great Britain was based upon the well-known fact that the confederate cruisers in respect of which this claim was made bore the confederate flag, were officered by confederate officers, and carried on war against the United States in the public and belligerent sense, and that they were aided to carry on that war by having been either fitted out or supplied with munitions of war or enlargement of crew, &c., through the friendly assistance of the people of Great Britain, and therefore that we had the same right against Great Britain in respect to indemnity that we would have had against the confederate people if, after having conquered them, there was anything but our own people to levy an indemnity upon. So, as the case has been put in the correspondence between the United States and Great Britain in the first place, and in the presentation of the American case, the tribunal of arbitration took the place of the sword, and in respect to these particular vessels we obtained indemnity in substance to precisely the same extent that we would have obtained it in prosecuting a just war against Her Majesty's government and people and taking that amount of money from the exchequer of Great Britain.

Then the question would be, what right the citizens of the United States as such had to this money. Their property has been destroyed; their towns, if it had been a war upon land, have been laid waste; their citizens, if there had been an engagement, have lost their lives, have been forced to flee, and all that, giving us a just cause of indemnity against Her Majesty's government for an act of war upon us. Now, having obtained the indemnity, I suppose everybody understands in a case of that character that no particular citizen of the United States whose house happened to be swept away in the heat of an engagement, or whose fences were overthrown in an invasion, or whose store was occupied by the troops of the hostile forces and all its provisions and supplies and property taken for their uses, would have any claim upon the Government of the United States because we had got an indemnity.

The principles of public law, as the committee understand them, are that in every case of that character the injury to the citizen is one which is incident to war; one which necessarily flows from it, and in respect of which the government, which is bound, it is true, to defend him, is under no obligation to him. In other words, if the destruction of a citizen's property is really and truly a belligerent and warlike destruction by an enemy, and it is destroyed because the citizen is the citizen of a country against which the enemy is making war, t gives no ground of claim, either with an indemnity or without, against the treasury of the government whose citizen he is. Therefore it follows that this sum of money belongs to the nation, although it may have been calculated upon some estimate of the value of the vessels of the citizens, as it must be in every case if you are to take a just indemnity by war, whether in money or in territory. It is, of course, calculated upon an estimate of the value of the vessels, the loss of voyages, the destruction of furniture and of cargo, the loss of wages—everything, which I need not enumerate that enters into the amount of the national loss, inasmuch as a nation can only be injured, with a very rare exception, through the elementary fact, so to speak, that the property or the persons of its citizens are the object of the injury in the first instance. That is the injury to the nation; and, therefore, in estimating the amount of indemnity which is to be recovered, either by the coercion of the sword, as in the case of Prussia and France and many other cases that might be named, or the gentler coercion of arbitration, as in this case, the money which may be received in the one case or the other is the property of the nation, to be disposed of according to its own sense of what duty or generosity or charity or assistance, whatever you may call it, to any particular class of its citizens requires. Therefore if we find that a particular citizen has specially suffered in reference to this particular invasion, or in reference to this particular warfare of the Alabama, then we can say with a certain propriety, we in whole or in part will make this citizen good. If, however, we find that the citizen was engaged in the business of speculating upon the operations of that particular vessel, and taxing the whole property and commerce of the United States, by way of premiums, in order to make profit out of the fact that such a vessel and others of like character were afloat, and did in fact, although in the particular case it failed, make money and profit out of the whole extent of his operations, that citizen has got precisely what he contracted for. He has gathered from the whole commerce of the United States a fund based upon the fact of war and of the sailing of these cruisers, out of which he has agreed to indemnify the particular sufferers, and has done it.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me ask a question there, as I want to be enlightened as we go along. Suppose I owned a vessel that was captured by one of these cruisers and comes within the rules laid down in this bill, and in sailing that vessel in my ordinary method of business I got pay for that vessel during the war, why should not that rule apply to me as well as to an insurance company?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know. If the Senator could state a case that might possibly arise of that character, perhaps I might give an opinion, though I might not be able to do so even upon that.

Mr. HAMLIN. I mean to state this principle: vessels were on the ocean in their ordinary mode of business and for the purposes of gain, just as it was the business of insurance companies to insure vessels. Now you apply a rule to the insurance offices that demands them to take an account-current and show that they lost in their business before you will indemnify them. Why, I ask, should not the same rule be applied to all the other parties that come within the provisions of this act, so that they must have an account-current stated showing that they lost before they shall be entitled to anything?

Mr. EDMUNDS. There would be practically a very obvious distinction I think. In regard to the private citizen who does not make an insurance but who in his whole business may have made money during the war, it might happen that in nine cases out of ten his vessels, that he was sailing in other seas or coastwise, were not exposed at all, and it would therefore be absolutely impossible to determine whether he had made money out of the state of war and out of vessels engaged in such commerce and exposed to such risks. It would be a sum which it would be impossible to solve, because you could not get the first step in the equation from which you are to start your argument. There would be the difficulty. Another answer is, that the case of the insurance company, and the case of the private sailor are entirely different in this respect: the insurance company has its business rested, as respects its war business, solely upon the state of war; it does business upon the state of war; it fixes its premiums upon the state of war; and it does nothing else so far as respects the question we are now discussing; and therefore you are able where betting of that kind, if you can call it that, was going on as to whether a vessel shall be lost by capture or destruction, or shall escape, to determine certainly whether the speculation, or the gambling, or the insurance, call it what you will, has been one which entitles the citizen to claim any injustice or generosity in respect to his affairs during the war from the government. But in respect to the private citizen, as to his freights, as to the use of his vessel, it is totally impossible to lay down a rule by which you can understand whether in respect to the risk of capture the man has made money or has not. You may show that his ship through the whole course of the war made money down to the time that it was sunk; that he made half a million dollars; you may show that then she was sunk and that he lost $250,000, and so there is a clear gain of $250,000, you may say; but to know whether he was making money out of the fact that he was speculating on the state of war in the use of his ship you would have to inquire into exactly what sort of commerce she was engaged in, where she was sailing, what sorts of freights she was carrying, whether she was sailing under the American flag or some other; what seas she was in; what was the degree of exposure. Hence it is perfectly impossible, logically, as it appears to me, to refer the gain or loss of the private ship-owner to the state of war; whereas in the case of the insurance company it only requires the addition of a column of figures on the one side of the ledger and on the other to know certainly whether gain or loss has happened from the state of war. That is a difference; and it appears to me to be one which it is impossible to overcome.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Vermont, in answering the Senator from Maine, says that you cannot compute the private loss of the merchant, because some of his ships may have been engaged in the coastwise trade and not subjected to the hazards of war; and yet this bill would make every insurance company account for its war premiums on precisely those coastwise vessels.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Ohio would have been more fair—and I have no doubt he intends to be perfectly fair—if he had stated the whole of my answer to the Senator from Maine or to the Senator from Wisconsin. He did not. He took one single element that I mentioned as one of the thousand elements that would enter into the consideration of risks as the whole of the case upon which the distinction rests between the instance of a private ship-owner and the instance of a corporation or a private person who makes taking war risks his exclusive business, as it respects this subject that we now have in hand. There is the difference. I only referred to the coastwise trade as showing one of the difficulties and appreciable elements which might enter into the question of whether the individual ship-owner had gained or lost on account of the state of war. That is the point. The insurance company gains or loses from the fact that it does or does not take war premiums, and does or does not get war funds enough, specifically received as such, to meet the war losses. Now we find that it has; it therefore has made money in a way that you cannot deny out of the very fact that the state of war existed, and the state of danger existed, which induced it to go into that business. Now, if you can say that a vessel is in the same situation; that a vessel is built solely because there is a war, and that it is built solely to run the risk of being seized and destroyed, and that the business of the citizen has a single reference to the fact that he is to make or lose money, if he can, out of getting as near to a confederate cruiser as possible and then getting away, you would have something like similarity; but of course, as it appears to me, the idea it totally inadmissible. The two things have no relation to each other at all in point of principle. The one man is engaged in general commerce, or any kind of commerce, for the purpose of ordinary gain, taking, with the risks of the seas, with the risks of fire, with the risks of the rocks, with the risk of the barratry of the captain, with all the risks that enter into any kind of business, the one risk also of the possibility of capture. He makes profits for three years against all those risks. Then his vessel is destroyed, and he still has $100,000 of profit. Now are you to say, as you do in the case of the insurance company, that he has made that $100,000 of profit because of the fact that his vessel was exposed to risk? I cannot see it.

Mr. HOWE. May I suggest a difficulty to the Senator?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly. If the Senator from Wisconsin cannot, nobody can.

Mr. HOWE. I do not propose to enter into this debate, and I must get my instruction when somebody else is on the floor. I understand that this is money which the United States recovered, not as the next friend or the guardian of A, B, C, or D, who lost property; but it is a fund which the United States recovered for itself because a foreign government abused, misused the United States, made war upon the United States, and now pays this money as an indemnity to the United States, so that it is money in the Treasury belonging to the Treasury; and the question is of its disposition. The injury which Great Britain occasioned, it seems to me, did not fall on the owners of the particular bottoms which the Alabama and other cruisers sent to the bottom, but it fell on the whole mass of the people, who had to furnish the means for resisting this act of war. This money belongs to the whole mass of the people, if I understand the Senator's theory. Now, why should it be taken from the mass of the people, who all suffered by this act of war, to pay the particular individuals who can say that during the war particular pieces of property were destroyed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is a good deal of force in the argument (because it is an argument instead of an inquiry, although both perhaps) of the Senator from Wisconsin, undoubtedly. It is with considerable difficulty that you can say clearly that any citizen of the United States whose property was destroyed by confederate cruisers is more entitled than another citizen whose property was destroyed in some other way. But in respect to injuries upon the sea, the particular property of the citizen is the object of the warlike attack when it is made, differing from the invasion of an army, whose object is not, under modern warfare, to destroy private property because it is private property, or to take possession of it because it is private property. In the case of the destruction of a vessel at sea, which is not an armed vessel, the attack is leveled at the particular thing it then has in hand; and although the ultimate purpose no doubt is to injure the nation through the body and property of its citizens, yet you can separate as a fact and distinguish as a fact the results of an invasion of a country and the incidental destruction of private property in the operations of war, from the case of the destruction of a private ship on the high seas by a belligerent cruiser, where the sole object of the cruiser at that time and in that campaign is to do identically that thing, in order through the private person to inflict injury on the public in general. So it seems to me that there may be, and is, a greater equity in the claim of the private person whose ship has been thus destroyed, upon the assurance of the Government to make good to him, in whole or in part, for such a destruction, than there is in the ordinary case of the incidental destruction of property in an invasion upon land, where the object is either to conquer a country or to attack an army which is to be reached.

There I think is a just distinction in point of fact, one which I believe, in the case of indemnities that have been given to citizens or subjects of a country from special injuries growing out of war, has been more or less observed; and of course it is upon that ground, as far as that is a ground, that we provide for paying out any of this money at all. But when you go a step further and say that you will pay this money to a party standing upon what is called a technical right of substitution for the owner of property, but who in fact out of that property and other property of the same character made a a large profit based upon a speculation of the chances of that very destruction, and that was his sole business, then it is an entirely different thing, because in the case of the citizen himself he would have made his profits, greater or smaller, if the war had not existed, greater still it may be, while in the case of the insurance company it would have made no profits at all if the war had not existed. It would, of course, upon its peace policies, and it does now upon its peace policies, because issuing peace policies is not taking risks against warlike destruction. But when you come to the war policies, the insurance company makes nothing at all if there is not the state of war, because it can get no war premiums in time of peace. That is another distinction; but when we come back to the question of the Senator from Wisconsin, the only answer that I can give to it is the one that I have stated, that a fair distinction is drawn between maritime destructions and destructions upon land, the one being ordinarily and, as in these cases, specially intended as the destruction of private property which was outside of the territory of the United States and upon the highway of nations, and in the other case the incidental destruction of private property upon the land, where the object of the army of one kind or another was an entirely different one and the destruction was incidental. In the one case we have provided by the act of last year, as far as this body was concerned, for payment. In the other case, I believe every one agrees that we ought not to provide for payment; at least that was the conclusion of those who were here after the war; and the only dispute has been whether the cases of destruction upon land fell within the line of incidental warlike destructions, or whether they fell within the line of a public appropriation to the use of the United States in some way which led to the destruction of the property.

Mr. SCOTT. At this point I ask the Senator to permit me to put a question, for I desire to understand the theory of this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. Do I understand that this bill goes upon the theory that a citizen of the United States, whose property has been destroyed and seized by an act which is recognized as a violation of the neutral duties of Great Britain, is to be considered as standing in the same position as the citizen of the United States upon land whose property has been destroyed by the act of a recognized enemy, one with whom we were at war?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; I have not said anything of the kind.

Mr. SCOTT. The question put by the Senator from Wisconsin and the line of argument used by the Senator from Vermont led me to doubt whether that distinction was recognized or not, and I simply put the inquiry for the purpose of ascertaining the fact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will state the view of the committee on the subject on which the Senator from Pennsylvania makes inquiry. If we had pursued Great Britain for an accidental destruction of the property of the United States, we being a neutral and she being a belligerent with some other power, then any destruction that she had committed against the property of American citizens would have been an illegal destruction. If her cruiser in that case had destroyed a vessel of a citizen of the United States it would have been an illegal destruction. If her cruiser had captured a vessel of the United States it would have been an illegal capture, which would not have changed the property of the owner at all and in respect to which he would have had a right, not by grace, against the government of Great Britain which he could enforce against her; of course according to such terms as she might please to give him as to methods, and which he could justly ask his government to enforce against her for the damage which he had sustained. But if Great Britain had been a belligerent against us and in the course of that belligerency had destroyed a vessel of an American citizen, then it would have been a lawful destruction and the citizen would have had no claim against Great Britain or the United States either. Now, what was this case? This case, we must not forget, was a destruction, not by a vessel of Great Britain, not as found by the arbitrators by a vessel of Great Britain acting under the British flag or manned by British crews, in the sense of their being national, but the destruction was by a vessel bearing the flag of an independent belligerent, because in the sense of belligerency the confederates were recognized by almost all the civilized countries of the world as independent—that is to say, they had exactly the same belligerent rights that they would have had in case they had achieved their independence; the laws of public war were applied to them everywhere, and we applied them ourselves at last, and the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that it was a war as respects these public questions that we are now discussing. Therefore the Alabama, being not in the sense of my friend from Pennsylvania a British ship engaged in belligerency against some other power and in violation of our neutral rights making an illegal capture and destruction of an American vessel, but a confederate vessel lawfully existing, in the sense of public warfare, upon the public seas of the world, was lawfully prosecuting warfare against American cruisers and American commerce—chiefly against commerce, I am sorry to say—but it was prosecuting war in the public sense, and it was a legitimate warfare in that sense. Then when the Alabama sunk a vessel the owner of that vessel had no claim upon the confederates; and though the confederate vessel had received an augmentation of its forces or had been fitted out by the assistance of subjects of Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, it was still a confederate cruiser; and therefore if the citizen of the United States had no claim against the confederate captain for an illegal destruction of his ship, certainly he could have had no claim against anybody who assisted that confederate captain in supplying his vessel with the means and munitions of warfare, for if the flag under which this rightful destruction took place was not amenable by the laws of public war to the consequences of an illegal destruction, then those people who supported that flag and supplied it and aided it by their friendship and alliance cannot be made more responsible than the party who destroyed it in chief.

And so it is laid down in the books on the laws of war, that if one nation, whether it pretends to be neutral or otherwise, departs from its neutrality and assists one of the belligerents for the purpose of giving aid to that side or allows its citizens to do so, it stands in the same attitude precisely in every public respect as the real and chief belligerent, and we may make just war upon such an ally or assistant or accessory, call it what you will, those who aid our enemy, without even a declaration of war, which some of the writers have thought to be necessary in the ordinary cases of proceeding to those extreme measures. So that, as the Senator will see by looking at the proceedings, the case, the treaty, and the award, the responsibility of Great Britain, as decided by the arbitrators, was not that her citizens had used any illegal violence toward any property of a citizen of the United States, but that her citizens had assisted a belligerent that had as good a right as any other nation in that sense to make war upon us, to enable her to do the destruction that she did, and so far as that could be traced Great Britain was held by the judgment of the tribunal, instead of being held by the weight of the sword, to respond to us as a nation. Hence the question which my friend from Pennsylvania suggests, in my opinion, does not arise.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I now move to strike out the words I have indicated, beginning at the first word on line 13 of section 12, and ending with the word "loss" on line 22.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CONKLING in the chair.) The Senator from Ohio moves an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out in section 12, commencing on line 13, the following words:

> And no claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court by or in behalf of any insurance company or insurer, either in its or his own right or as assignee, or otherwise, in the right of a person or party insured as aforesaid, unless such claimant shall show, to the satisfaction of said court, that during the late rebellion the sum of its or his losses, in respect to its or his war risks, exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks; and in case of any such allowance, the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, nothing but a sense of what I consider due to the plainest principles of law and justice and to the requisitions of the national honor, would make me say one word on this subject to-day, for I am in no condition of health to speak, and besides, if I were, I do not know that I could hope to have the attention of those whose votes will determine the fate of this amendment.

Here is a bill for the distribution of more than seventeen millions of money among different claimants, in which the Government is bound to do justice, to hear the cause and to understand the cause, so that its decision shall be according to the very right. And here is a bill that involves the national honor, for if this distribution shall not be what honor as well as justice requires, then this Government will be disgraced in the eyes of the civilized world. And yet, sir, more than half the seats of this Senate are vacant and will be vacant until the time for voting shall come upon the yeas and nays. Therefore there is very little encouragement for any man to speak upon this subject, and much less encouragement when it so happens that under somewhat similar circumstances a decision was formerly made by the Senate which he now asks the Senate to reverse.

Mr. MORTON. I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that he is not in a condition to speak, and if it meets the Senator's approbation I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. THURMAN. I am frank to say that I would prefer to speak on Monday, when I may hope to be in a somewhat better condition of health than now; and for the purpose of having the sense of the Senate on the question, I will let the motion be made.

Mr. MORTON. I make the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection, if my friend from Ohio is not able to go on.

Mr. THURMAN. Although I came prepared, yet I do feel so unwell that I do not care to speak; but if any other Senator wishes to speak on the subject to-day, I will give way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; you ought to be heard next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at two o'clock and seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 8, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of the Rock Island convention, held March 24, 1874, on cheap transportation; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN NORTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

Mr. DUELL. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, for present consideration, the bill (H. R. No. 3032) to change the times for holding the terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States for the northern district of New York.

The bill was read.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I feel compelled under the circumstances to object to the consideration of the bill at present.

GAS-WORKS.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to move that the bill (S. No. 733) regulating gas-works be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

There was no objection, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I am instructed by the Committee on Rules to report an amendment to Rules 128 and 129.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rules 128 and 129 by striking out the words "and Saturday" where these words are used in said rules, so as to read:

128. Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private bills and private business, in preference to any other, unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House.

129. On the first and fourth Friday of each month the calendar of private bills shall be called over, (the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House commencing the call where he left off the previous day,) and the bills to the passage of which no objection shall then be made shall be first considered and disposed of. But when a bill is again reached after having been once objected to, the committee shall consider and dispose of the same, unless it shall again be objected to by at least five members.

The SPEAKER. The effect of the amendment is simply to make Friday private-bill day alone, instead of Friday and Saturday both.

Mr. RANDALL. It is proper that I should state to the House what prompted the Committee on Rules, without dissent, to recommend at this time this change. It has been found that under the change of rule in other respects adopted at this session of Congress private bills are, and have been for some time past, seriously interfering with public bills and public business. The committee therefore deem it wise in the future to assign but a single day for private bills. Gentlemen will understand the importance of this change when I state the fact that one-fifth of the time of the House is occupied in the consideration of private bills, every one of which has its motive power in depleting the public Treasury. If there is any further explanation desired I am ready to give it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I can hardly see how the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] can make the statement that one-fifth of the time of the House is taken up with the Private Calendar. It is very certain that the record will not bear him out in that statement. Now, if he means that one-fifth of the time is given by the rules, he may have stated the fact correctly.

Mr. RANDALL. That is what I intended to convey.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. But as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, we have had but one day, I think, for four or five weeks past, and we have not occupied both days but once this session. There was one week in which we occupied both Friday and Saturday; but as a rule we have not had on an average a private-bill day once in three weeks for this whole session. Now, if the Private Calendar had occupied the two days which the rules assign to it and if private business had been pressed in the face of the public business, it seems to me there might have been some reason for the introduction of this amendment to the rules, but as a matter of fact if this rule is adopted it will give but three days in each four weeks for private business, because the third Friday in each month is given to the District of Columbia, so that if every day that the rules assign as private-bill days are in fact so occupied, if this rule shall be adopted private business will only have three days in every four weeks.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Private Calendar has certainly not been forced upon the House on any day this session, and there is no probability that it will be; but if this rule shall be adopted we cannot get a Saturday, we can get no day but Friday, and it seems to me that the change is utterly uncalled for. That is my view of the matter, and I hope the proposed amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say one word more. We all know that under the rules Monday is almost a dead day in legislation. Fridays and Saturdays are devoted to private business, if those having it in charge choose to maintain its right to preference, so that in fact out of the five legislative days in a week private bills have two.

Now, the fact of the matter is that these private bills have during this Congress received more consideration from this House, at least, than during any session I have ever been here. There is another point, Mr. Speaker. If at any time those private bills granting pensions are behindhand, we always find this House by a nearly unanimous vote willing to give an evening session for their consideration, so that no pensioner shall at any time suffer either by the stringency of the rule or by its latitude.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the Committee on the Rules that one day in the week is enough to devote to private bills, but it occurs to me that if we have but one day it had better be Saturday than Friday.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I think not. I desire to say one word upon that point. I am of the opinion that private-bill day should be a day on which the House will give attention to private bills; and hence if but one day is to be devoted to private bills, I prefer that it should be Friday rather than Saturday. I have endeavored upon each occasion when the House has gone into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar to have it on Friday rather than Saturday, for the reason that I desired to have a full attendance and to have members interested in the Calendar as much as they are in any other business. The consideration of private business ought not to be put on Saturday, when the House is tired and fatigued and members do not give that attention which ought to be given to private bills.

Mr. RANDALL. And in addition to that I will say that it is believed that, members of the House not taking great interest in private bills, attempts would be made to adjourn over from Friday to Monday, and then private bills would have no day.

Mr. COBURN. I desire to ask one question. I did not hear the proposed amendment read; and I would ask if the Committee on the Rules considered the point that Friday is the day assigned for the business of the District of Columbia?

Mr. RANDALL. That is only one day in the month.

Mr. COBURN. That would give only three Fridays in the month to private bills, instead of every Friday. The District of Columbia now has one-fourth of the Fridays in the month. If private business is to be confined to Fridays, then it ought to have every Friday and the rules ought to be so amended as to give the fourth Saturday in every month to the District of Columbia, instead of the third Friday. I think myself that we have devoted too much time in proportion to private bills, or rather that we have set apart for private business too much time. We have pushed it aside recently, but I think that at least one day in the week ought to be given for the consideration of private bills uninterrupted by other business.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to move to amend the rule so as to give Friday of each week to private business and to give the third Saturday in every month to the District of Columbia. If it is true that there is now too much time given to the Private Calendar, it must certainly be true that too much time is given to the District of Columbia when a whole day is given to it every three weeks. It certainly cannot be fair to give to the Committee on the District of Columbia that much time if you say that too much time is now given to the Private Calendar. I think a fair arrangement would be to give each Friday to the Private Calendar and the third Saturday of each month to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I would be content with that arrangement.

Mr. RANDALL. Upon further reflection I think the gentleman is correct, but I have no power to accept any change such as he suggests.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Then withdraw your resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. No sir; but I will tell you what I will do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can permit that amendment to be offered.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the object of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] to be to give to the Private Calendar the Saturday of the week in which the Committee on the District of Columbia has the Friday.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. No, sir; to give the Committee on the District of Columbia the third Saturday of each month, and let the Private Calendar have each Friday. My proposition is to change the rule so as to give the Committee on the District of Columbia every third Saturday of the month; that is, amend Rule 82 by striking out "Friday" and inserting "Saturday."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that for the first three or four months of a long session of Congress it is very rarely that a Saturday session is held for business. Therefore any assignment of Saturday for the business of any committee would not amount to a great deal. If the business of the Committee on the District of Columbia be assigned to Saturday, it would be simply saying that for the first three or four months of a long session of Congress there would be no legislation for the District of Columbia.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest that the resolution as reported from the Committee on Rules be passed, and then the gentleman can send to the Committee on Rules a proposition to confine the business of the Committee on the District of Columbia to the third Saturday of each month.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. No; I do not want to do that.

Mr. POLAND. It seems to me that the suggestion to make Saturday private-bill day instead of Friday is a very good one. I think that arrangement would insure the transaction of business on Saturday. I have noticed that we generally have a better attendance on private-bill day than on almost any other. And if Saturday be made private-bill day, I think it would prevent the adjournment over Saturday. I think it would be better to have some given day at the end of the week for private bills, than to have it in the middle of the week. In that way we would get rid of the difficulty suggested in regard to the Committee on the District of Columbia taking one of the Fridays in each month. Let them have one Friday in the month, and let all the Saturdays be devoted to the consideration of private bills. I think that would tend very much to the advancement of business, and would certainly tend to insure sessions on Saturdays.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think there is danger of adjournment over Saturday for the remainder of this session.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I would inquire why the Committee on the District of Columbia cannot be put upon the same footing with other committees?

Mr. COBURN. I would suggest that the third Monday in each month be taken for the business of the District of Columbia. We can dispense with Monday better than we can with any other day of the week.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I want to put that committee on the same footing with other committees.

Mr. COBURN. I move to recommit this report to the Committee on Rules with instructions to report an amendment to the rules so as to provide that the third Monday of each month, after two o'clock

p. m., shall be devoted to reports from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. RANDALL. As the reporter of the resolution from the Committee on Rules, I am willing to test the sense of the House on the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN.]

The SPEAKER. The proposition is that the rule relating to the Committee on the District of Columbia be amended so as to substitute Monday for Friday; that is, to give that committee the third Monday in each month after two o'clock instead of the third Friday. That would require unanimous consent, as no notice of the proposed change has been given. The proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] to recommit would operate as a notice to the House, and when the subject is again reported from the Committee on Rules the House can act upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. I think there will be no objection to changing the rule as suggested in regard to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. In that case each Friday would be given to private bills.

The SPEAKER. The rule would leave it so.

No objection being made, the rule in reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia was changed by substituting Monday for Friday.

The amendment of the rules relating to private bills, as reported from the Committee on the Rules, was then agreed to, giving Friday only of each week for the consideration of private bills.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I would inquire how these changes in the rules affect business on Saturday?

The SPEAKER. They leave Saturday the same as Wednesday and Thursday, for general business, when sessions are held on that day.

FREEDMEN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. DURHAM, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency a bill (H. R. No. 3265) amending the charter of the Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the committee be authorized to report this bill back at any time.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2986) to appropriate $3,000,000 in aid of the centennial celebration and international exhibition of 1876. The pending motion is that of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. After the decisive vote yesterday upon this bill, I am free to say that I do not care further to prolong the matter by the motion I made last evening. I therefore withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table being withdrawn, the question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BURLEIGH,] that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS FROM OVERFLOW OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I ask the House to take from the Speaker's table for immediate action the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River." I call up this bill, not for the purpose of moving that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, as was done in the Senate, but to move that the House concur in the Senate amendments; for this is a measure that appeals to humanity and demands immediate action. The Senate has amended the bill by adding to the appropriation of $90,000 the sum of $100,000, making in all $190,000. The Committee on Appropriations of this House has examined this subject, and is satisfied that here is a case of great and imperative pressure; and it asks the House to concur in these amendments immediately, so that this money so much needed by the sufferers will at once be ready for their relief. The committee hopes that the passage of this measure will be taken by the country as an encouragement to benevolent private effort in the same direction, and that the subscriptions which have been so freely and generously given will be continued. The amount appropriated by this amended bill is not large compared with the magnitude of the calamity that has fallen on that distressed region. The money is needed to-day. Although there are some things in the phraseology of the Senate amendments which, if this were an original proposition, might I think be improved, yet rather than delay this benefaction for a single day, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments so that the bill may become a law as speedily as possible and that the sufferers may receive the needed relief at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. COBURN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Does he not know that the President is now authorized by law to issue rations and clothing to those people, and that this bill has nothing to do whatever with supplying them with what they need? It is merely to fill the deficiency created by withdrawing food and clothing from the resources of the Government. It does not make a particle of difference whether this bill be passed to-day, to-morrow, or one month hence. It has nothing to do with furnishing the supplies, because the President has now general authority to issue the supplies, and has issued them. There can be no greater humbug in the world than to talk about making an appropriation to feed those people down in Louisiana and elsewhere, when an act of Congress giving full authority has been passed some days ago and signed by the President.

I shall insist that this proposition shall go to the proper committee—the Committee on Appropriations. I have in my hand a letter of a gentleman at Vicksburgh who says that the danger in this matter is that persons who now have employment may abandon it in order to depend upon the bounty of the Government. We ought to be cautious about this matter. The original bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations left it discretionary with the President to issue what amount of supplies he chose; and, I repeat, we cannot be too cautious in giving these large amounts for a purpose of this kind. Senator ALCORN (if I may refer to what took place in the Senate) cautioned that body against making extravagant appropriations.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The answer to the gentleman from Indiana is this: Both Houses of Congress did pass a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish rations to these suffering people, but that resolution did not provide any means by which those rations might be furnished. We appropriate every year for the regular Army establishment whatever seems necessary for that object; but that regular appropriation does not provide for or anticipate such a case as this. The Secretary of War finds that in his regular supplies he has not the means for carrying into effect the express wish of Congress; and therefore, in order that our resolution may be something more than "sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal," the Committee on Appropriations ask that Congress vote this money, so that the power conferred upon the Secretary of War may not be mere emptiness.

Now, as to the question of immediate need, let me tell the gentleman that this question has been looked into by the Committee on Appropriations on the part of the House as well as on the part of the Senate.

And what would be gained by the gentleman's point, instead of passing this immediately and making it a gracious benefaction, to delay and send it to the Committee on Appropriations, which at once is ready to report it back to the House? As it is not a regular appropriation bill, when reported it might be stopped on the floor by a single gentleman. The gentleman from Indiana himself might object that, not being a regular appropriation, the committee could not report it at any time under the rule, and it would have to lie with all the committee's work, which can only be reached on regular call. This is a case of immediate necessity.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a remark before this matter is disposed of. When the proposition for the relief of the suffering people of Louisiana first came before the House some six weeks ago, I objected to the consideration of the resolution and asked that it be sent to some committee, and it was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and by them reported adversely; and that ended it. When it came before the House again a few weeks later, I asked that it be considered by a committee, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It was a resolution authorizing the President of the United States to issue rations, and it was reported by that committee favorably when I happened to be out of my seat. If I had been in my seat I do not know that I would have objected to the passage of the resolution. I would not have objected for this reason only, not because I think such appropriation of money is within the scope of any constitutional power given to Congress, but because, if at all, it is warranted as the unanimous sense of the people of the country. It is not a bill or resolution which ought to pass here if there is any serious objection to it. It is simply a charity; and the officers and managers of a bank might as well take the funds of that bank and distribute them in charity as for the representatives of the people to take the funds of the people out of the Treasury of the United States and distribute them in charity.

Cases of that kind have been not uncommon. It was done in the case of Chicago—not by any appropriations of money, but rations were issued by the military officers, Congress not then being in session. Practically it was then done. It has been done also in the case of providing a vessel to send provisions to a foreign country in case of famine. So it seems to be recognized as within the power of Congress, when a great and overshadowing calamity occurs which appeals to every man's humanity, to give instant relief by making some appropriation out of the Treasury, or by authorizing rations to be distributed by the military officers.

It is in that view, Mr. Speaker, I say I do not make objection to the passage of this bill, and would not if I had been in my seat have objected to the passage of the original resolution which practically called for this appropriation of money. But it is an appropriation of money in a direction where this House ought to act with the utmost caution. It ought to act with the utmost caution also because, as has turned out in this case, there are some people in that section of the country who now seem to think that they can be supported by rations issued from the Government of the United States, and therefore they are under no particular need of providing for their own support; and thus our charity may in the end be productive of more evil than good.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine a question, in order that the House may better understand what this proposition really is. If I understand the effect of the law passed at this session it provides for the issue of rations to these suffering people.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, I will have read the resolution which was passed by both Houses and which is now the existing law upon the statute-book.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Let the law be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to direct the issue temporarily of supplies of food and disused Army clothing sufficient to prevent starvation and suffering and extreme want to any and all classes of destitute or helpless persons living on or near the Lower Mississippi River, who have been rendered so by reason of the present overflow of the Mississippi River.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Now let me ask the gentleman from Maine a further question, whether the amount of clothing or rations which will be issued will not be regulated by the amount of money which Congress will appropriate for that purpose?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That is to say, this simply reimburses to the War Department what may be issued in the way of rations and clothing?

Mr. HALE, of Maine. That is it exactly. If we do not appropriate and the suffering continues, and these rations are issued, then there will be a deficiency of course in the appropriation for the War Department. Undoubtedly the gentleman understands the true import of the pending bill. By Congress taking up and fixing the amount of appropriation, that amount would be taken by the executive branch of the Government as an indication of the amount to be expended, for the present at least.

In reply to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD,] or rather in accordance with his suggestion, I will say that other powers, when great and overshadowing calamities have come upon them, as in this case, have spent money in sums that are mammoth in proportion to this sum. Great Britian will expend, I am told, $30,000,000 for the relief of the starving and dying people of India; and this is $190,000.

I yield for a few moments to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE.]

Mr. MONROE. The gentleman from Maine yields to me for a moment to explain the action of the Committee on Education and Labor in regard to a measure similar to this which was brought before the House earlier in the session. As the action of that committee has been alluded to, I desire to say a word in regard to it. Early in the session when a proposition was sent to us to afford relief to sufferers in the South, the suffering, as far as the committee could understand, seemed to be of that general and common character which exists all over the United States to a greater or less extent, and which was found very largely in all the cities of the North as well as in portions of the South. It was the opinion of the Committee on Education and Labor, at that time, that for the House to undertake to relieve general suffering, common suffering of this class, liable to occur any winter, would be almost equivalent to undertaking to relieve the whole pauperism of the United States out of the Federal Treasury. And it was for that reason that the committee unanimously reported adversely to the resolution which was referred to them at that time.

But, sir, the proposition which is now before the House seems to me to be of an entirely different character. The sufferings that these poor people are experiencing from the overflow in Louisiana and other States is of a wholly exceptional character. It is a thing which will not often occur. It does not happen in the ordinary course of events. It is a calamity of that kind which, so far as I know, every civilized nation, every nation aspiring to the name of Christian, has never hesitated for one moment to relieve; and hence it is that, notwithstanding the action of my committee formerly, I am satisfied that the committee would unanimously favor the proposition which is now before the House. I think we ought promptly, without a moment's delay, to appropriate every cent of this money and let it go where it will "do the most good."

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. HALE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF WOLF RIVER.

Mr. AVERILL. I ask unanimous consent to have the bill (H. R. No. 3028) giving the assent of Congress for the improvement of the Wolf River across the Menomonee Indian reservation, in the State of Wisconsin, taken from the Speaker's table for the purpose of moving concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

In line 2 strike out "Weshena" and insert "Keshena."

In line 9 strike out "to the Indian agent" and insert "into the Treasury of the United States."

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. AVERILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON THE POST-OFFICE AND POST-ROADS.

Mr. PACKER. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to ask the permission of the House that that committee may sit during the sessions of the House for the purpose of making the investigation referred to it by the House.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

SOUTHERN RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to an order of the House made under a suspension of the rules, the House proceeds to consider the following bills reported by the Committee on the Judiciary: The bill (H. R. No. 1937) for the relief of the State of Tennessee, and the bill (H. R. No. 1938) to extend the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of debts due from southern railroads, and for other purposes." By order of the House these bills are entitled to be considered for one hour, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is entitled to the floor thereon.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The order was that both bills should be considered within one hour?

The SPEAKER. Both. The Clerk will proceed to read the bills.

The bill (H. R. No. 1937) for the relief of the State of Tennessee was read.

Mr. FRYE. The Committee on the Judiciary have instructed me to report a substitute for that bill, which I send to the desk to be read.

The substitute was read, as follows:

That the Secretary of War, by and with the advice of the Attorney-General of the United States, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to compromise, adjust, and settle all demands, legal and equitable, between the United States and the State of Tennessee in relation to railroads and railroad property and obligations growing out of the same, on such terms as may be equitable and just and best calculated to protect the interests of the United States. And in ascertaining the liability of the State for the property purchased by the Edgefield and Kentucky, and the Memphis, Clarksville and Louisville Railroad, he will charge only the actual market value of the property to the date of the purchase with legal interest; that value to be ascertained by proof or by agreement with the officers and agents of the State of Tennessee: Provided only, That said settlement shall be made and executed before the meeting of the next Legislature of Tennessee in session, or if not so made and executed, then that this act shall be approved by the said Legislature at its next meeting in session.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House agree to the substitute?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I think we ought to have some explanation.

Mr. SPEER. Has the substitute been printed?

Mr. FRYE. It has not been printed, but it is almost identical with the bill reported in relation to southern railroads generally.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I think there ought to be some explanation of this substitute.

Mr. FRYE. There will be an explanation given of the whole bill. It is not necessary on the adoption of the substitute.

Mr. LAWRENCE. In what particular does the substitute differ from the original bill?

Mr. FRYE. In the original bill there was a very long "whereas," and two or three provisions were contained in it which are not contained here, which the Judiciary Committee did not consider of any special importance.

Mr. LAWRENCE. What were the limitations?

Mr. FRYE. There was a provision in the original bill that the Legislature of the State of Tennessee should ratify the action of Congress before the bill should become a law. We afterward discovered that the Legislature of the State of Tennessee had authorized the governor of the State to settle this claim himself, and that he desired to settle it this summer before the meeting of the Legislature, and there is a provision put in by which he may settle it.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the substitute provides for the payment of interest?

Mr. FRYE. It does.

Mr. SPEER. From what date?

Mr. FRYE. From the date the property was taken.

Mr. SPEER. I think that is an improvement on the printed bill. Then does the substitute provide for any report of the action of the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General being made?

Mr. FRYE. The Attorney-General and the Secretary of War are to settle it.

Mr. SPEER. Are they required to report their action to Congress or to the President?

Mr. FRYE. They are authorized to settle it.

Mr. SPEER. Should they not be required to make a report of their action?

Mr. FRYE. They can be compelled to report, of course, as they were before.

Mr. BRIGHT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question while he has the floor?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. BRIGHT. I would ask if the bill offered as a substitute contemplates anything more than that it places the settlement between the State of Tennessee and the General Government on the same ground as that upon which similar settlements have been made between other States and the General Government?

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; it does not.

Mr. BRIGHT. It places them on the same ground?

Mr. FRYE. It places them in the same condition precisely that the Forty-first Congress placed certain other railroads.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. How was this orginal price agreed upon or ascertained?

Mr. FRYE. All that will come up in the consideration of the bill itself, when the substitute shall have been adopted.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. Why should not these claims be setiled in the courts?

Mr. FRYE. That question also will come up in the bill. I would like to have the substitute adopted, and then further information can be obtained before the bill is put upon its passage.

The question was taken on the substitute; and it was agreed to.

The question recurred upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, the report accompanying this bill is quite lengthy, and I think I can state the case so that the House can understand just what it is that the State of Tennessee desires. During the rebellion when Tennessee was in secession our Government seized all of the railroads in that State, taking possession of them as fast as our Army got to them. It took possession of all their rolling-stock and run the roads in the interest of the Government. The officers of the Government used up all of the rolling-stock; they destroyed a great deal of it; and at the close of the war, in 1865, the Government found itself possessed of all these railroads and of rolling-stock worth about $6,000,000 which they had put upon the road in renewal of that which they had destroyed, and they were operating the railroads at a cost of $1,000,000 a month. Their necessity for the roads had almost entirely ceased, and the President of the United States ordered General Thomas to deliver up these roads to the owners in the South, and to sell to them all the rolling-stock on those roads pro rata, and to take from them security for payment for that stock, Appraisers, United States officers, were appointed to make appraisal, and the owners were to take the property at that appraisal. It was said to them, You must take this property; at any rate if you do not take it we will take your road away from you and keep it away from you. No option whatever was given them. There was testimony given by General Meigs, which to me was absolutely conclusive, that the Government compelled them to take this railroad property at one-third, if not one-half more than its actual value.

Now, what is the result of that, supposing you make them pay? Why it is this: you confiscated all their railroad property when the State went into secession and you overran it. That was as much punishment as you meted out to anybody in the South, and more than you meted out to ninety-nine in one hundred. The stock in these railroad companies was owned by Union men and disunion men, by women South and women North; their bonds were owned largely at the North by loyal men. In that condition of things you confiscated the whole rolling-stock, worth six or seven million dollars; and then you turned around and sold it to them at your own valuation, a valuation which your own officers admit to be excessive by at least one-third, and compelled them to take it, thus confiscating one-half or one-third more.

Now, the Secretary of War, with the Attorney-General, was authorized to settle certain suits with southern railroads, commenced some three years ago, to collect this very class of securities. In connection with two or three distinguished lawyers, all on our side in the matter, they made an examination. They found that in the $2,800,000 there ought to be a reduction, by reason of the overvaluation, of $1,400,000; in other words, that you had compelled a sale of these railroads for just twice what the property was worth when you sold it, thus making that other confiscation of one-half.

Now, the State of Tennessee practically owned four of these railroads; it held a mortgage of them for a great deal more than they were worth. Therefore your officers would not take the securities of the stockholders of the corporation, but they said to the State of Tennessee that it must give us its bonds for the property. So the State of Tennessee, having already given millions to these railroads, gave its bonds to the United States for this additional sum. What Tennessee now desires is this, that you shall not ask it to pay any more for this rolling-stock than it was worth when it took it. That is all the State asks, and there is no difficulty at all in getting at that value, not the slightest. Is that asking any too much?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. How are you going to get at that value?

Mr. FRYE. The Secretary of War, in his report of last year upon the settlements he had made in regard to other roads, reports that no difficulty was found, that the proof was ample, and that in his opinion the United States recovered all the property was worth.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Why not take the valuation at the time the property was sold?

Mr. FRYE. Because, as General Meigs says, and as he told them at the time, nobody believed that the bonds would ever be collected. It was a mere matter of form; just at the close of the war; just after the southern armies had been sent home by General Grant with orders to go about their business and that no punishment would follow.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is there any report or statement made by the officers of the United States who had charge of these railroads at the end of the war in respect to the condition and value of the rolling-stock which had been put upon the roads by the United States; any report other than this appraisal upon which these bonds were given?

Mr. FRYE. There is a report of a commission, nearly as thick as this book which I hold in my hand, of an investigation which covers the whole of this question, made about two years ago.

I desire to go one step further. The State of Tennessee has a defense; first, that she was compelled by your officers to give these bonds and take this property; they were obtained from her by duress. To my mind it presents a very serious question whether or not you can collect these bonds. Again, the law of the State of Tennessee provides that the limit of interest shall be 6 per cent. and no more, and that any contract made in violation of that law shall be absolutely void; I am told that the constitution of the State of Tennessee so provides. Now, your officers took from the governor of Tennessee bonds bearing 7.3 per cent. interest. To be sure the Government of the United States would not be answerable on the ground of usury. But did not the governor of the State of Tennessee, in executing those bonds, exceed the authority which the Legislature had given him? Did the Legislature give him authority to make an illegal contract? To me it is clear that it did not.

Then when you go into court to collect the bonds and that defense is put in, I think it would present a very serious question indeed. And if that defense was put in and the court should rule that there was no authority on the part of the Government to do that, where would you be? You would have to go on the quantum meruit ground, and recover from the State of Tennessee the actual value of the property at the time it was taken, and that is just exactly what this bill provides. Has any gentleman any other question to ask in regard to this bill?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. As far as I can judge from the remarks of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] this seems to be an equitable settlement, although I confess I am unable to see in what respect it is any easier to ascertain to-day what was the value of that rolling-stock eight years ago than it was to ascertain it at that time. If the commission which was appointed by the United States Government eight years ago to ascertain the value of that property did ascertain it justly at that time, I should regard, and I think any court in the absence of proof of fraud would regard, that as the highest evidence to-day of the value of that property; certainly very much higher evidence than could be obtained now. I suppose much of that stock has been used up by this time, and the testimony now obtained must necessarily be parol testimony to show what was the condition of the property at that time. This report of the commission upon which the settlement was made seems to me to be as high evidence of the value of the property at that time as any other evidence that could now be obtained.

If this bill is to be treated as an acknowledgment on the part of Congress that we do not regard the appraisal of that commission as of any value whatever; in other words, if it is to be treated as an impeachment of that appraisal, so that the Secretary of War can throw it aside and pay no attention to it in this settlement, then it occurs to me that we are going a great way too far on this question. As to whether these bonds can be collected or not I am not prepared to say, for I have not examined that question. So far as that question enters into the matter, it is obvious enough to me that it must have been provided for at the time. I should be sorry, and I think the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] would be sorry, to accomplish the result that our legislation now should be regarded as an impeachment of the official finding of these officers of the United States.

Mr. FRYE. Allow me at this point to read a brief extract from the testimony of General Meigs, one of the officers who made this valuation:

> I did not expect we would get much if any money from them; and I supposed that Congress in its discretion, in order to aid in re-establishing trade and prosperity, might think fit to relieve them from this claim.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. If this were a proposition directly and on its face to relieve the State of Tennessee from any obligation to pay these bonds, I am not prepared to say I would not vote for it. But if it is simply a proposition to reassess the damages, (if I may use that expression,) it occurs to me that it is practically an impeachment of that old finding.

Now, if Quartermaster-General Meigs was one of the officers who made the estimate in respect to the value of this property, he probably had better evidence upon which to base his judgment at that time than he would have to-day unless he went back to his old finding. In other words, as everybody must see, it would be almost impossible after the lapse of eight years, by any testimony other than such as was in existence in writing at the time, to prove what was the value of this property at that time; and this bill, as I understand, proposes to make the settlement upon what was the actual value of the property at that time. It was the actual value of the property at that time that was sought to be ascertained by the officers of the United States. General Meigs, in the extract which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has just read, does not say he thinks the former estimate as to the value of the property was wrong, but that he never expected the United States to realize anything from these bonds, and so he did not consider it of much consequence whether the amount was large or small.

I repeat, I do not wish to antagonize this bill except so far as it would seem to be on its face an impeachment of that old finding; so that the Secretary of War and Attorney-General might say, "Congress has found that that was an extravagant and exaggerated estimate of the value of the property at that time, and so we will throw that all aside and rest simply upon such evidence as we can now collect in respect to that question."

If the State of Tennessee is not liable on these bonds by reason of some informality, or because the rate of interest stipulated for is larger than that which the statute of Tennessee prescribes as the legal rate, then the State of Tennessee does not need any measure of this sort.

Mr. FRYE. They do not want to be put in that position.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Had the committee any evidence before them, other than this statement of Quartermaster-General Meigs, to show how largely in excess of the actual value of the property that former estimate was?

Mr. FRYE. No; not in figures, only in general terms. The gentleman will remember that it was an ex parte proceeding entirely; the other side had nothing to do with it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understand that.

Mr. FRYE. A dozen of those roads refused to take this property at the appraisement. Then General Thomas said to them, "Under my orders you shall take it or we take possession of the road."

Now, as to the supposed impeachment of the old finding, I would say that on the 3d of March, 1871, when the Government had brought suits against three of these great railroads, and those suits were pending in the courts, Congress passed precisely the act which I have reported here; and the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General, together with Aaron F. Perry and Stanley Mathews, under that act of Congress made this appraisement which has been reported to the House and on which settlement was made.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I am not objecting to any readjustment of this matter or antagonizing the bill in that regard. I only desire that this debate may leave the question in such a shape that the measure shall not be regarded as a declaration on the part of Congress that that old finding was exorbitant or exaggerated. I wish the officers of the Government to take that finding into account as well as any other evidence that may be brought forward in arriving at the final adjustment. That is all I care for; and if such a proviso could be put into this bill, I should be glad. I am not prepared at this moment to suggest the appropriate language for such a provision.

Mr. FRYE. They are our own officers who are going to make this settlement; it is entirely in our hands. I now yield to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND.]

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Judiciary were entirely unanimous in reporting this bill. The circumstances in relation to it were somewhat peculiar. The Government had taken possession of these roads and had used them for a considerable period of time during the war, for which use the owners of the roads thought they were entitled to some compensation; but the Judiciary Committee thought they were not. The Government had used up the rolling-stock that it found upon the roads; and it was claimed that this rolling-stock which the Government had used up should be an element in this settlement. We thought not. But it was very apparent to the committee that this property which we sold them, and for which we hold the bonds of the State of Tennessee, was taken by them at a greater price than its real value; and although I do not think there is in this case any such element of duress as comes within the legal definition of that term, so as to constitute any defense on their part, still it is true that they had very little choice about the matter; the thing was dictated by the officers of the Government entirely. Instead of this price being fixed by a mutual arbitration, by a board chosen mutually by the parties, the valuation was made by officers who were appointed or detailed to make the appraisement; and it is undoubtedly true that these officers considered it somewhat a matter of form; that the United States having taken these roads and used them for some years, having used up the rolling-stock that was upon them, the payment for that rolling-stock, as they supposed, would never be exacted. Therefore they regarded their functions as somewhat nominal, and they made their figures at rather round numbers.

There are some legal difficulties in the way. There is the question my friend from Maine suggests, whether the governor was authorized to give such a bond as he did. I did not think that of much account. I hardly supposed the State of Tennessee would come into court or before any tribunal to make a question of usury or power of the governor to make the bond, but still these legal difficulties in the way do exist, and it seemed to the Judiciary Committee that it was the fair and just and honest thing for us to do, saying that we will have a readjustment of the value of this property; that we will pay just what we honestly ought to pay and let that end the matter.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move to amend by striking out the following words: "or by agreement with the officers or agents of the State of Tennessee."

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to allowing that amendment to come in.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEBTS DUE FROM SOUTHERN RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1938) to extend the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1871, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of debts due from southern railroads, and for other purposes," and it is now before the House for consideration. It is a bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas the Secretary of War was directed and authorized by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1871, to compromise certain suits instituted by the United States against certain railroad corporations which purchased material from the Quartermaster's Department under the provisions of executive orders of August 8 and October 14, 1865; and whereas issues have been raised and are pending in the settlement of the accounts of other railroad corporations which made purchases under said orders and against which the Government has not commenced suit: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice of the Attorney-General of the United States, to compromise, adjust, and settle the same upon such terms as may be equitable and just and best calculated to protect the interests of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, and the gentleman from Maine is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to move an amendment to the bill.

Mr. FRYE. I do not think I can yield for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. SPEER. I regard this as a very important bill, involving a million or two of dollars.

Mr. FRYE. I will hear the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That the action of the Secretary of War shall not be binding on the United States until the same shall have been approved by Congress.

Mr. SPEER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the vast power which this bill proposes to put into the hands of a single officer of the Government, the Secretary of War, who I admit, under the Constitution of the country, is one of the executive officers of the Government, and against whom personally and officially I have not a word to say. But the Secretary of War cannot be expected to give his personal attention to all matters of this kind. They are from the necessities of official business distributed largely to subordinates in his office, to mere clerks, gentlemen of no professional or legal knowledge or experience, and who make no pretension to any such legal knowledge or experience.

Mr. NEGLEY. I beg to differ from the gentleman. There is a great deal of ability in these subordinates.

Mr. SPEER. I do not say there is no ability among these subordinates. I believe they have ability, but they are not gentlemen of such professional or legal knowledge as would justify their being intrusted with the whole control of these important questions.

Mr. NEGLEY. There is marked ability among these clerks, as I know from my personal intercourse with them.

Mr. SPEER. I do not wish to say an unkind word against any of the officials of the War Department. This bill involves two or three million dollars to the Government. The questions involved properly belong to the courts; they are now pending in the courts. The bill takes them out of the courts and puts them into the hands of the Secretary of War, and he from necessity must commit them to his subordinate officers.

Now, is there anything wrong in my amendment? It simply provides, after the Secretary of War shall have gone on and settled and adjusted these claims amounting to millions of dollars, that nothing further shall be done or paid until his action shall have been transmitted to and approved by Congress.

What objection in the world can there be on the part of any honest railroad company or any honest man in a case of this kind to wait until the representatives of the people shall have passed upon the opinion of the Secretary of War? It is right; it is just and honest. And before the House commits to the Secretary of War the disposition of millions of dollars, as much as was asked for the centennial yesterday—before it commits that to the Secretary of War and the clerks in his office, I think it should pause at least to consider my amendment. I do trust the gentleman from Maine will let it be considered as pending, and if he does not, I hope the House will refuse to sustain the demand for the previous question, so that I may have the right to offer this amendment and have the sense of the House upon it.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The gentleman from Maine allows me to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the bill. The language is the same as that used in the other bill just passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of the bill these words:

And, in so doing, he will charge and exact the actual value of the property at the date of purchase; that value to be ascertained by proof.

Mr. FRYE. Now, let me say one word here in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.] The amount involved here, at interest at 7.3 per cent., from the date the property was taken or the bonds were given, is only about $2,800,000; so that if you get half of it, as you got in your other settlements authorized by the Congress of the United States, it will be a loss, if you please, of $1,400,000. But the gentleman must remember that the most of these roads are actually bankrupt; that one-half of the securities you take are worth but very little; and the best way to get anything, in the view of our committee, out of them was to make some kind of settlement.

Then the Secretary of War is not alone. The Attorney-General is coupled with him. And I have confidence that, being officers of the United States in the pay of the United States, they will at least do justice to the party that employs them.

Now, I confess that I have a great deal of sympathy for the roads. They were left in a terrible condition. They are in a terrible condition to-day. With these bills unsettled, they cannot borrow money, they cannot issue bonds. This state of things is working a terrible calamity to the routes of transportation that it touches all over the South. They have paid already to the Government of the United States on this forced sale over $5,000,000. In my judgment the United States has received to-day all that the property was worth which they sold to these roads.

I call for the previous question.

Mr. COBURN. Before the previous question is called I want to inquire of the gentleman from Maine what is to be gained by a compromise such as is proposed? Do these railroad companies propose to offer any additional security?

Mr. FRYE. They do.

Mr. COBURN. Do they propose anything better than the lien the Government has now upon the roads and the rolling-stock?

Mr. FRYE. They do.

Mr. COBURN. I would like to know what security they propose. We are asked now to put into the hands of the Secretary of War unlimited authority to compromise upon that property upon which we have the first mortgage and the first lien, and whatever there is good in it is ours. Why should we compromise? If these men owe us anything, let the mortgage be foreclosed and let the thing be settled according to the agreement and according to the law, as has been fairly and honorably understood all along. I see no necessity now for yielding any rights we have, or for putting one iota of authority into the hands of the Secretary of War. These men have had year after year to comply with their contract, and there is nothing in the circumstances going to show that the debt is not an honest and fair one and that the property was not worth a large amount more than they gave for it. I have understood so all along, and I see no earthly reason now why we should yield away any rights of property we have there and relinquish into the hands of an officer of the Government authority to compromise about a matter which should never be intrusted to any man.

I wish to say that if the bill passes the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] ought beyond all question to go upon it. Congress is the tribunal which ought finally to adjust this matter. It has been a matter of legislation. It is a matter which the people should settle, and not one officer, however honest and capable he may be; and I make no reflection upon him in saying what I have said.

Mr. SPEER. Am I to understand that the gentleman from Maine refuses to yield to me to offer my amendment?

Mr. FRYE. I refuse to yield to the gentleman for the amendment.

Mr. SPEER. Then I hope the House will refuse to sustain the demand for the previous question.

Mr. FRYE. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I am surprised that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] with his known liberality toward our people, should have spoken as he has done on this question. He is mistaken in every assertion he has made in reference to this proposition. The Government has not the first lien on this road or any roads of my State. The State has the first lien for the bonds they issued for the original construction of the road, and there are two or three other mortgages prior to this lien.

Another word in regard to the rolling-stock. From one-third to one-half of it was the identical stock that the Government of the United States captured from the confederate government when it seized our roads; and when this stock was purchased by the companies the understanding was that the Government would pay the State of Tennessee for the use of the roads after they were captured and used in the interest of the Government. That was the reason why the railroad companies took this property at the Government appraisement. The cars and engines were badly constructed; they were built for war purposes, and were not worth more than half of the value that was put upon them by the agents of the Government when they were turned over to the State. The agents of the Government, from the highest to the lowest, have so testified, as the gentleman will see if he will look to the report made during the last session of the Thirty-ninth Congress. The companies took this rolling-stock at the Government appraisement, believing that the Government would make a fair, just, and honorable settlement and pay for the use of their roads. That is why they agreed to pay this large price.

I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] will not prevail. The Legislature of our State meets next January and will sit but seventy-five days. It will then adjourn, and Congress will not meet until the next December, and it will be a year before they can get a report even if Congress should act promptly in the premises.

Mr. SPEER. Is the gentleman afraid that Congress will not approve of an honest settlement?

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. Congress would approve of an honest settlement if the matter could ever be reached with the amount of business before it. The Secretary of War and the Attorney-General are to represent the Government. They understand this proposition. They have been in the Departments ever since the war. We only ask for our State what has been accorded to the other Southern States.

Mr. FRYE. I now move the previous question.

Mr. SPEER. I hope the House will not sustain the previous question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman will allow me to make one remark before he insists on the previous question.

Mr. FRYE. I cannot yield, for the time allowed for the consideration of this bill has nearly expired.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 92, noes 13; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FRYE and Mr. SPEER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 125, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment offered by Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SPEER. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 3 members voting therefor.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. FRYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour begins at twenty minutes before one o'clock, and reports from committees of a private nature are in order.

PEKIN ALCOHOL COMPANY.

Mr. BECK, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1473, a bill (H. R. No. 3266) for the relief of the Pekin Alcohol Manufacturing Company; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to enter satisfaction on the export bond for that portion of the distilled spirits of the Pekin Alcohol Manufacturing Company of the State of Illinois said to have been destroyed at Urbana, Ohio, while in transit for export to the port of Genoa, upon proof satisfactory to him and the Secretary of the Treasury of the destruction of said spirits without fraud, collusion, or negligence on the part of the owners thereof.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I believe that bill is subject to the point of order.

Mr. BECK. There is no appropriation in the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the point of order would lie against the bill if the gentleman from Vermont insists upon it. It proposes to surrender a certain right of the United States which might be enforced at law for a valuable consideration. Does the gentleman from Vermont insist on his point of order?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I dislike to have invidious distinctions made in favor of bills which are liable to the point of order.

The SPEAKER. It is not a direct appropriation in any sense.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BECK. This case, which is fully proved, was presented and prepared by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCNULTA] from the following testimony:

First. By the petition, sworn to, and the affidavit of H. P. Westerman, president of the company, showing the regular shipment in bond, in accordance with law, of fifty barrels of alcohol from Pekin, Illinois, December 21, 1872, for export to Genoa, Italy, which was accidentally destroyed by fire while in transit on the railway of the Indianapolis, Bloomington and Western Railway and its connecting railroads, at Urbana, Ohio, on the 29th of December, 1872.

Second. By the certificate of J. Merriam, collector of the eighth district of Illinois, corroborating all the facts as to the shipment.

Third. By the affidavit of Charles M. Foster, station-agent at Pekin.

Fourth. By the bills of lading.

Fifth. By the affidavit of Hilton H. Leach, the cooper who put all the barrels in order when shipped.

Sixth. By the affidavits of J. H. Brown and L. S. Purcell, the agent and road-master of the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railroad at Urbana, who witnessed the destruction of the alcohol, which prove that it was an accident.

On these facts the Commissioner of Internal Revenue says he sees no objection to the passage of the bill, which he caused to be prepared. We present it as prepared in the department, and lay the written statement of the Commissioner before the House. We recommend that the bill do pass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BECK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RICHARD HAWLEY & SONS.

Mr. WALDRON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 2279) for the relief of Richard Hawley & Sons; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the Committee on Claims, reported back the following; which were referred to the Committee on War Claims:

The bill (H. R. No. 2975) for the relief of Dr. William M. Page, of Richmond, Virginia;

The bill (H. R. No. 3230) for the relief of the heirs of James W. Eastwood, deceased;

The bill (H. R. No. 3232) for the relief of Elihu S. Marshall, of Nashville, Tennessee; and

The petition and papers in the case of Benjamin Gratz, of Lexington, Kentucky, for compensation for buildings and property destroyed by fire while occupied by the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, also, from the same committee, reported back the following; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

The petition of George C. Johnson, of Piqua, Ohio, for relief on account of his claim against the Shawnee Indians; and

The claim of Henry Warren, for compensation on account of Indian depredations.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, also, from the same committee, reported back the following; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the memorial of Franklin Lee and Charles Dunbar for payment of $24,009.50 for blasting and removing rock from Ashtabula Harbor, Ohio.

Mr. LANSING, from the same committee, reported back the following; which were referred to the Committee on War Claims:

The petition of Lucy A. Barker, for compensation for damages to property occupied by the military at Louisville, Kentucky; and

The petition of Ann J. Eaton, for compensation for loss of crops and damage to land, taken possession of by the Secretary of War, on Long Island, Boston Harbor, Massachusetts.

Mr. NUNN, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3268) for the relief of J. N. Reed; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

IRASBURGH NATIONAL BANK, VERMONT.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Banking and Currency, for consideration at this time, a bill changing the name and location of Irasburgh National Bank of Orleans, county of Orleans, State of Vermont. I know that it is not in order under this call, but I think there will be no objection to it on the part of any one.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which objection to its present consideration will be in order.

The bill authorizes the Irasburgh National Bank of Orleans, now located in the town of Irasburgh, county of Orleans, State of Vermont, to change its location to the town of Barton, in the same county, whenever the stockholders representing three-fourths of the capital stock, at a meeting called for the purpose, shall determine to make such change, and directs the president and cashier to execute a certificate, under the corporate seal of the bank, setting forth such determination, to be recorded in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency; and thereupon such change of location shall take effect, and the operations of discount and deposit of said bank shall be carried on in the town of Barton, and such acceptance shall be made within one year after the passage of the act; all expenses incident to the proposed change, including engraving, to be borne and paid by said bank.

The second section provides that nothing in the act shall be so construed as in any manner to release the said bank from any liability or to vacate any action or proceeding at law in which the said bank may be a party in interest.

The third section provides that whenever the location of said bank shall have been changed, in accordance with the first section of the act, its name shall be changed to Barton National Bank, and all debts, demands, liabilities, rights, and powers belonging to the Irasburgh National Bank of Orleans shall devolve upon and inure to the Barton National Bank, and all actions pending for or against the Irasburgh National Bank may be prosecuted by or against the Barton National Bank in the same manner and with the same effect as if such change of location and name had not been made.

The fourth section provides that as soon as such change of location and name shall have been made, public notice shall be given by publication in a newspaper published in Barton for two weeks successively

Mr. BURCHARD. Why can there not be a general law covering all such cases?

Mr. RANDALL. If you had a general law there would be changes all over the country.

Mr. BURCHARD. This is the fourth case reported favorably this session.

The bill (H. R. No. 3267) was then read three times, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEE ON WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. MORRISON, from the Committee on War Claims, reported adversely the following bill:

A bill (H. R. No. 1914) for the relief of Augustus Sprague, late a private of Company B, Second Michigan Volunteers.

Mr. POLAND. I ask that that bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SPEAKER. That will be done, and the adverse report will be printed.

Mr. MORRISON also, from the same committee, reported back the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

A bill (H. R. No. 1376) for the benefit of the widow and minor children of Dr. W. H. Kidd, late surgeon of the board of enrollment for the first congressional district of Kentucky.

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3269) for the relief of A. S. H. Crenshaw, of Jackson County, Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I am directed by the same committee to report adversely in the matter of Moses B. Bramhall, and to move that the application be laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. COBB, of North Carolina. I object to the motion to lay on the table, and ask that the case go to the Private Calendar.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It cannot go to the Private Calendar; there is no bill. This is merely an adverse report.

The SPEAKER. Upon what is this report made? What was referred to the committee?

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. A bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina objects to laying it on the table, and asks that it go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. The adverse report will be returned to the gentleman to be presented with the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, from the same committee, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 1005) for the relief of David Huestis; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin, from the same committee, reported back, without amendment, the bill (S. No. 110) for the relief of the East Tennessee University; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 113) for the relief John Zumstein; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, from the same committee, reported back adversely the memorial of William Shawfrey; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FRENCH BROAD RIVER, NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. WHEELER, from the Committee on Commerce, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3114) to provide for opening the navigation of the French Broad River, in North Carolina, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN HORN, JR.

Mr. HOOPER, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2398) granting a medal to John Horn, jr., for his heroic exploits in rescuing men, women, and children from drowning in the Detroit River.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the President of the United States to cause to be prepared and presented to John Horn, jr., of Detroit, Michigan, a gold medal, with appropriate devices and inscriptions, in recognition and in commemoration of his heroic and humane exploits in rescuing men, women, and children from drowning in the Detroit River.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOPER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. COBURN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3270) to amend an Army officer's record; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. GUNCKEL, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of Charles O. Palmer, late a private of Company F, Twenty-fourth Massachusetts Volunteers, for remission of sentence, and asking for pay and allowances; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3118) for the relief of Mary Conly, late widow of R. H. Murrell, late an officer in the Tenth Tennessee Cavalry; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM MYERS.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. The Committee on Military Affairs have directed me to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3166) to correct the date of commission of certain officers of the Army. I ask that this bill be now put on its passage.

The bill was read. It recites in the preamble that there was a vacancy of major in the Quartermaster's Department on the 18th day of January, 1867, to which Captain William Myers, of the Quartermaster's Department, was entitled to be promoted under the laws then in existence, but from which he was excluded by reason of an appointment in said department erroneously made. The bill therefore authorizes the President to nominate and promote William Myers to be major and quartermaster, to date from the 18th of January, 1867, to take place on the Army Register next below Major J. G. Chandler. But no officer in that department is to be by this act reduced from his present rank, nor shall any additional pay or allowance be made to any officer by virtue of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the last clause of this bill, providing against any increase of pay, include this officer?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. One further question. Is this bill reported in consequence of some mistake which the committee find to have been made?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I think myself, and I believe the committee also think, that this bill is rendered necessary in consequence of a mistake of the President of the United States in 1866 in appointing a certain number of officers over this officer, when they ought not to have been appointed over him. The design of the bill is to correct a mistake of the Executive in 1866.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is going very far back to correct the roster of the Army. I would like to hear a brief statement of the case.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Let the report of the committee be read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would be glad to hear it.

The report was read. It states that when the act of July 20, 1866, to increase and fix the military peace establishment, was passed, Major William Myers held the commission of captain and assistant quartermaster in the Army. His name appeared on the Army Register below that of Major J. G. Chandler. Under the law Major Myers was entitled to promotion by seniority to the grade of major, and should have received the same relative rank in his corps as he had before the act was passed. He did not receive such promotion; but appointments were made by which, in violation of the rule governing in such cases, he was deprived of the promotion to which he was justly entitled; he was overslaughed by the promotion of his juniors in the same department. By section 9 of the act of July 5, 1838, it is provided that "promotions in said Quartermaster's Department shall take place as in regiments and corps;" that is, by seniority.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not demand the further reading of the report.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I demand the previous question. After it is ordered I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I hope the demand for the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. COBURN. I would like to say a word upon this bill.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I will yield to the gentleman after the previous question is seconded.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. THORNBURGH. Mr. Speaker, the question involved in this bill is in my judgment an important one, for it not only affects the grade and rank of officers of the Quartermaster-General's staff, but affects the grade and rank of officers in other departments of the military service. Under the act of 1866 certain new offices were created in the Quartermaster-General's Department. Under that law, as it was then interpreted by the President of the United States, he filled those appointments by selection; the Senate, believing he had the right to do so, confirmed those appointments; and the officers then appointed and confirmed hold their positions in the Quartermaster-General's Department to-day. By this bill, however, Congress now declares, if the bill should pass, that those appointments were wrong, and should not have been made. It proposes to establish as the rule that original vacancies created by the law of Congress cannot be filled by selection, but must be filled by seniority. If a bill of this character is passed it should be a general bill, and not one applying to the Quartermaster General's Department alone. There are in that department now two colonels, three lieutenant-colonels, and two majors, who are entitled to a certain relative grade and rank upon the Army Register to-day, who will under this bill receive promotion sooner than they would if the law should stand as it is.

The whole question depends, Mr. Speaker, on the simple proposition whether the President of the United States is compelled in filling original vacancies created by law to fill them according to seniority of rank or by selection. From 1811 down to the present day the rule has been, so far as I have been able to discover, that original vacancies created by law shall be filled by selection. If this bill passes, it will of course reverse that rule and establish a different precedent in the future. I am opposed to the bill, and think it ought not to pass.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, for ten minutes.

Mr. COBURN. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, this bill ought not to pass. It depends upon the construction of the thirteenth section of the act of 1866, being an act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States. At that time the number of quartermasters was increased by law. Several original vacancies were created and appointments were made at that time of certain officers in the Quartermaster-General's Department of the same grade as Major Myers who now applies for promotion by act of Congress. He was then a captain. The simple question is whether or not the President had the right to fill an original vacancy by selection, or whether under this law of 1866 the President was bound to make the appointment according to seniority of rank, which is the regular rule of promotion in the Army. Ordinarily where there is a vacancy the President is bound to promote according to seniority. That is the invariable rule and has been, and nobody disputes or denies it, but here was a lot of original vacancies created, and the President had the clear right to fill those vacancies from such persons as he pleased; in other words, he was not bound to follow the rule of seniority. The law was expressly made for the benefit of meritorious volunteer officers, who are now to be stricken down by this bill.

It is argued that there is a peculiar phrase in this section 13 of the act of 1866 which justifies the construction which is now attempted to be put upon it, and I will call the attention of the House to that for a moment. I will not read the whole section, but will begin at the point indicated. After providing that there shall be a certain number of colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors, the section goes on to provide further that there shall be forty-four assistant quartermasters with the rank and emoluments of captains of cavalry, and the vacancies thereby created in the grade of assistant quartermaster shall be filled by selection among persons who have rendered meritorious service as assistant quartermasters of volunteers during two years of the war. Now this clause which authorized the President to appoint assistant quartermasters by selection from among persons who had rendered meritorious service as assistant quartermasters of volunteers is the language upon which the argument turns. Here the President being specially authorized to fill these vacancies of assistant quartermasters by selection from the volunteers, it seems but fair to infer that no other officers can be appointed under this section. The construction I give to this, and I believe it to be the fair one, is, that the object of this language is to authorize him to fill these vacancies by selection from volunteers, and compels him to take that class of officers to fill that grade from quartermasters of volunteers, and does not confer upon him the power to fill those offices by the rule of seniority. He already had the power to fill original vacancies by selection, had it as to every one of these original vacancies thus created, and it was not necessary to confer upon him that power. That was the rule of the Army, and had been from the beginning when these original vacancies were created, and the only effect and meaning of that clause is that the President of the United States was limited, was restrained, was confined to making these appointments from volunteer officers. That is all there is in that. Then, if there be nothing in this construction of this section, by reason of the argument that mention of some implied the exclusion of the others—if there be nothing in that, there can be no argument based on this section that will authorize the proposed action to-day.

Now, these men were appointed in 1866, and confirmed by the Senate; and there, at that very time, was the construction of the very body which passed the law, within two months or perhaps within a month of the time of the passage of the act—the very construction which we are now called upon to set aside. I believe, I have no earthly doubt, that it was the unanimous understanding of the Senate that the construction that was placed upon this law by the confirmation of these officers at that time was the true one. The rules of statutory construction are to the effect that the contemporaneous construction of a statute by those who have been engaged in enacting it is paramount to any other construction that can be made subsequently. It is peculiarly an authoritative one. And now, after almost ten years, we are called upon to set aside that construction which was made at that time, with a full understanding of the effect of of the law.

I want to say only a word about the effect of this. There is no question about the merit of the officer. The effect of this will be to unsettle the rank of quite a number of officers who are now superior in rank to this one. And this is not the last application that will be made to Congress in relation to this matter. If we begin this work there is no telling where it will end. To avoid applications of this kind, in the last session of the last Congress a bill was passed which it was supposed at that time would be satisfactory, and these men who had been as they claimed treated badly by the selection of the President made in 1866 were allowed to come up to the grade that they would have had had they been appointed at that time; but not to the rank, because it was the construction of the last Congress, as it had been of the Congress in 1866, that it was clearly within the power of the President to make the appointments, as they were made by selection, and it is clearly within the right and duty of the Senate to confirm the appointments; and the subject having rested for so many years, it was felt that now to disturb it would be dangerous. This bill is a blow at the volunteers that they do not deserve at our hands. Therefore I oppose this bill, and not from any objection to the officer himself, for he is considered to be a very deserving gentleman and held in very high esteem as an officer.

And let me just say in addition, that if we go into this business there ought to be a general bill and not special legislation in relation to this one officer. I now put in my solemn protest against this legislation as dangerous, as it will be troublesome. I believe it will result in involving us in many a controversey as to rank which never ought to come here, and will beget that dissatisfaction which the interference of Congress in these matters must inevitably produce.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I now yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DONNAN.]

Mr. DONNAN. I will say what I desire to say to the House in a very few moments. The law of 1866 provides that the Quartermaster's Department of the Army shall consist of one Quartermaster-General, with the rank of brigadier-general; six assistant quartermasters-general, with the rank of colonel; ten deputy quartermasters-general, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel; fifteen quartermasters, with the rank of major; and forty-four quartermasters, with the rank of captain. Then the law went on and provided that these assistant quartermasters—mark the distinction—should be selected from among the persons who had rendered meritorious services as assistant quartermasters of volunteers during two years of the war.

By the terms of the law it will be seen that only the assistant quartermasters were authorized to be selected from among the volunteers. The only way whereby it was claimed that promotions above this grade were justified was to hold that these were original vacancies, that is, for the officers above the rank of captain.

Now, let us see how that is. The law of 1851 provides that all promotions in the staff departments shall be made as in other corps of the Army. Suppose that Congress should enact that the present Army should be reduced by abolishing two first lieutenants in each regiment, the regimental quartermaster and the adjutant, thus making a reduction of eighty first lieutenants. Suppose the next Congress should re-establish those two grades, would any one imagine for a moment that that would be re-establishing the corps in the Army in such a way that the lieutenants might be selected from civil life to fill those offices rather than by a regular promotion by seniority in the Army? I do not believe there is a man in the House who would say so. Now, then, in fixing the military establishment in 1866, was the re-establishment of the Quartermaster's Department any such re-establishment as would make any offices in it original vacancies? Not at all, in my judgment.

I desire to say just one thing more. The regulations of 1857 and those of 1853 provide that the vacancies in a regimental corps with the rank of colonel shall be filled by promotion according to seniority, and all vacancies to the rank of colonel shall be filled by seniority, except in case of disability, &c. This is one of those cases. No one, I think, can successfully claim but that the Quartermaster's Department was an established corps, and that under the laws which I have just read promotion should take place in it in the same way as in other corps of the Army. Therefore it seems to me that it follows necessarily and absolutely that those up to the rank of colonel were entitled to promotion by seniority.

One word as to the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that we attempted to patch up this matter in the last Congress. It is true that the last Congress recognized the right of these officers to promotion, and they undertook to fix it up by a compromise. The party now before Congress simply asks that he be placed in the position to which under the regulations he is absolutely entitled in my judgment. There is no getting behind that fact, and in justice, according to the law, we are compelled to give him what he asks.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT.]

Mr. ALBRIGHT. There is one principle which has always governed the Army and which has done very much to maintain the spirit and the morale thereof, and that is that officers shall be promoted by seniority. The only law which ever interfered with that principle, as respects the staff and the corps of the Army, was the construction which was put upon the act of 1866 by some, and that only related to one class of men, namely, the assistant quartermasters-general, who held the rank of captain in the Army. They were to be appointed by selection. Those who held rank above that rank were to be promoted by virtue of their seniority. Now, by the unfortunate, and I believe improper, construction which was put upon this law, some officers were jumped or overslaughed, and great injustice has been done to such men as Major Myers. This law has received the construction of the constitutional advisers of the President. The Attorney-General has stated that the principle of filling vacancies by selections does not apply to such a case as the one before us. Therefore injustice was done Major Myers when he was not promoted according to seniority but was jumped by junior officers.

The Attorney-General says:

> When an act of Congress makes a new office, it is usual and proper to say that it is vacant until some one enters into the exercise of its functions. "All vacancies" is a very comprehensive form of expression, and must be rightfully construed to exclude a class of vacancies occurring in a particular way. Vacancies arise when persons holding offices die or resign, and they also arise when new offices are created and while there is nothing in the letter, there seems to be nothing in the spirit of the law to make any difference in the mode of filling both kinds of vacancies in the same way. This view is fortified by the language of the thirteenth section of the act in question, which says: "and all vacancies hereby created in the grade of assistant-quartermaster shall be filled by selection from among the persons who have rendered meritorious services as assistant-quartermasters of volunteers during two years of the war." The word "vacancies" is evidently used here to indicate as well offices coming into existence with the act as those vacated by promotion. Express provision is made that the "vacancies" in this grade shall be filled by selection from the volunteer forces instead of the regular Army; but the word also contains an implication that vacancies in higher grades to the rank of colonel are to be filled by promotion.
> I can find no grounds in the act of Congress or regulations of the Army touching this subject for holding that the word "all," in the regulations referred to, means "accidental;" and I am therefore of the opinion that the vacancies in the Quartermaster's Department above assistant-quartermaster to the rank of colonel, vacated by said act of July 28, 1866, are to be filled by promotion according to seniority, and not at the option of the President and Senate.

Now I wish to say, in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] that precisely this same thing has been done heretofore. A law was passed for the benefit of General Davis, of the Inspector-General's Department, to put him into his proper rank and place in 1872, and the phraseology of that act has been adopted in the bill now before you for consideration. It simply contemplates to do what is right. It does not propose to displace anybody in the Army, or reduce anybody in the Army from the rank he now holds, but to give Major Myers the rank and grade to which he would have been entitled if promotions had been made according to seniority in the Quartermaster's Department after the passage of the act of 1866. The laws of 1851 and 1863, in regard to promotions in the Army, have never been repealed, but were expressly re-enacted by the act of 1866; and therefore the principle of promotion according to seniority was the law when Major Myers was jumped.

That is all I have to say on this subject. I do not believe it is a case that calls for any debate. It is the opinion of the Secretary of War that this thing ought to be done. I feel satisfied that if a test case upon a quo warranto were made under the act of 1866, Major Myers would be awarded the place in his rank which this bill seeks to give him.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. PLATT.]

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. The bill before the House simply proposes to do justice long deferred to one of the most meritorious officers in the Army of the United States. I listened intently to the argument of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and as near as I can make out his only argument against the passage of this bill is that it will interfere with the vested rights of other officers in this department. Now, I do not believe that it does interfere with these vested rights; but I do not care if it does. If it is right, it ought to be done irrespective of that consideration. I do not believe in the policy of leaving a meritorious and good officer like Major Myers to suffer his vested wrongs simply because to right him might interfere with somebody else's vested rights. This is one of the instances which have frequently occurred both in the Army and in the Navy, where officers who have done their duty, and have never failed in its performance, and who occupy positions which entitle them to promotion, have been overslaughed and other officers put over their heads through influences brought to bear on the appointing power. I hope the House will not hesitate in doing justice to this officer, and that the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs will pass.

I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I simply desire to say that I hope it will be the pleasure of the House to pass this bill. It does injustice to nobody, and does justice to a very meritorious and worthy officer. It simply places him where the law ought to have placed him years ago but for an omission either intentional or unintentional, I know not which, on the part of the Executive then in power. I hope, therefore, as nobody will be displaced and nobody injured and it will not take one dollar out of the Treasury, that the bill will pass, and thus place this officer in the line of promotion where the laws of his country justly entitle him to be.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I yield now for a few minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT.]

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, in the two minutes granted me by the gentleman from Georgia I can only say I hope this bill may pass. I have not a single word to utter in detraction of the gentlemen who have by executive favor been placed above Major Myers on the roll of rank in the Army. My business relations with General Myers during the late war were very intimate and extensive. It was my fortune to serve in the same corps, and to know something of what he did and what his reputation was. I wish to bear testimony here that, in my judgment, no more efficient, faithful, honest, able, indefatigable officer was ever mustered into the service of the United States. Millions of money passed through his hands; immense amounts of property were purchased and distributed by him; his business and labors were immense, and his efforts were herculean. And there are gentlemen here who were then on the other side of the late contest, and who may have felt the shock that was first put in motion by the efforts and labor of General Myers, and I am glad to see them supporting this bill. It shows to me that they are as generous as they were brave. General Myers is an officer who, in my judgment, did as much to fit out and supply the forces that moved with such majestic grandeur from the West through the South during the late rebellion as any other officer in the Army.

I care not whether other officers may have been properly promoted or not; but I insist that the name of no officer shall be placed on the roll of rank by executive favor above the name of William Myers. Others served as well, but none better, and he should have that place to which he is entitled. He should not lose his place on the roll. In my judgment there can be no officer who has greater merit, more right, more claim to promotion, than has General Myers. His place is now occupied by another. Justice has been delayed too long; he should now be replaced where he belongs. No executive favor ought ever to be permitted to displace him from that rank, and I am glad of the opportunity of assisting in reinstating him to the place he has by his services so dearly earned. I have nothing to say against those gentlemen who have been placed on the roll above him. But if in our power, I say it is our duty at once to place his name on the roll where it belongs. I speak from personal knowledge of General Myers. My information comes to me through no second person. I know the man I am talking about; and if President Johnson had known General Myers as well as I do he never would have placed the name of any other officer on the roll above the name of William Myers.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to my friends here, and especially the members of my own State and of the West, to support this bill. I sincerely hope it will pass.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I now ask for a vote.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BILLS RECOMMITTED.

Mr. HUNTON. On behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs I ask to have recommitted to that committee two bills which are now in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. One is a bill (H. R. No. 1253) for the relief of the heirs of George Fisher; and the other is a bill (H. R. No. 1002) for the relief of certain settlers upon the military reservation of Fort Bridger, Wyoming Territory.

No objection being made, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bills, and they were recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. NESMITH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported adversely upon the following; which were laid upon the table, and the reports accompanying the same ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1650) to remove disability from James W. Barnes, late private of Company I, Twentieth Ohio Volunteers;

The petition of Jackson Case, for muster and order for pay; and

The petition of Robert McMurray, for relief.

Mr. NESMITH, from the same committee, reported the following bills; which were read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 3271) for the relief of Stephen M. Hunnicutt; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3272) for the relief of John T. Burchell, of Knoxville, Tennessee, for services rendered in small-pox hospital.

REPRESENTATIVES OF MARY ROBBINS, DECEASED.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the following; which was referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. No. 2369) for the relief of the personal representatives of Mary Robbins, deceased, who was the widow of Brintnall Robbins, an officer of the Army of the Revolution.

REPORTS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3274) granting a pension to John S. Corlett; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported the following bills; which were read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 3273) granting a pension to Rachael W. Phillips, widow of Gilbert Phillips; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3275) granting a pension to Eli Persons.

Mr. MARTIN, from the same committee, reported adversely on the following; and the same were laid upon the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 929) granting a pension to Elizabeth York;

A bill (H. R. No. 1367) granting a pension to Mary J. Raymond;

A bill (H. R. No. 2841) granting a pension to Caroline Treble; and

The petition of F. W. Nye, for a pension.

Mr. MARTIN, from the same committee, reported back favorably the following bills; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1183) granting a pension to Mrs. Martha R. Robbins;

A bill (H. R. No. 1483) granting a pension to Emily Phillips, widow of Martin Phillips; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3276) granting a pension to Davenport Downs.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the following; which were laid upon the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 863) granting a pension to Eunice Christy;

A bill (H. R. No. 1107) granting a pension to Harrison Mitchell;

A bill (H. R. No. 2428) to grant a pension to Jonathan R. Spencer; and

The memorial of William Parsons.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the same committee, reported back the following bill:

A bill (H. R. No. 2925) granting a pension to Dorothea Irons, mother of Lieutenant Joseph F. Irons.

Mr. RUSK. I ask that this bill be considered in the House at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read; after which objections to its present consideration will be in order.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Dorothea Irons, mother of Joseph F. Irons, first lieutenant of the First Regiment United States Artillery, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of the act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia, from the same committee, reported the following bills; which were read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 3277) granting a pension to Robert D. Jones, late a private in Company B, Third Regiment Pennsylvania Reserves; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3278) granting a pension to Margaret Beeler.

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia, from the same committee, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 78) granting a pension to Salem P. Rose, of North Adams, Massachusetts; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF CHARLES JOHNSON.

Mr. BUFFINTON, from the Committee on Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to the legal representatives of Charles Johnson, late a messenger of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to the salary of a messenger for two months.

Mr. BUFFINTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I desire to move that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] who has charge of the Indian bill whether it would not be better, if an arrangement can now be made, that the whole of to-morrow, from the conclusion of the reading of the Journal, shall be given to the Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope there will be no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the order will be made that to-morrow, from the conclusion of the reading of the Journal, shall be devoted to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

There was no objection; and the order was accordingly made.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. No. 2797) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of March 3, 1871.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. What reason is there for taking up that bill out of its order?

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee. I ask this on account of the distressed condition of the Southern States. This bill will relieve them to a great extent. It has the unanimous sanction of the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I think we had better reach that bill in its regular order.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would be very glad to have the bill taken up now in advance of other bills, but there are some amendments to be made to it.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. As amendments are to be proposed, the bill will take time. I insist on my motion.

EVENING SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask that there be a session this evening for general debate, no business whatever to be transacted.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. TYNER in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

FOSTER A HIXSON.

The first bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1775) for the relief of Foster A. Hixson, late a paymaster in the United States Army.

The bill was read. It requires and directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department to allow to Major Foster A. Hixson, late a paymaster in the United States Army, in the settlement of his accounts, a credit of $10,000, being the amount which was stolen from him at Charleston, South Carolina, on the 1st of March, 1867. But no part of this allowance is to be used to settle any other accounts of the paymaster; and it is to be in lieu of all allowances to him under existing laws.

Mr. WILLARD of Vermont. Let the report be read.

The Clerk read the report, which has been heretofore published.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I do not wish to oppose the passage of this bill. I know no special reason why Major Hixson ought not to be relieved of this charge against him. But in the report which has just been read reference is made to a man named Charles E. Hooks, who is said to have been a watchman at the hotel or boarding-house where Major Hixson was stopping when he lost his money. The report states that Hooks, the watchman, knew Major Hixson's coming there with the money, and of his depositing it and going out. It is further stated that Hooks left town that night at eleven o'clock; that he was afterward arrested and put on trial, but as the evidence was not sufficient to convict him he was discharged. I want to say just a word in justice to a man who lost an arm under my eye in battle, and whom I have known for twelve or fourteen years. Mr. Hooks no more took that money than I did. He has been ready to answer the charge from that day to this. He is in Government employ and in this city, and can be got in ten minutes. I wish simply to put on record with the report my protest against any insinuation by any detective or anybody else that my one-armed boy Hooks ever took one dollar of that money. That is all. He was a good soldier, and is as honest a man as walks the ground,

Mr. GARFIELD. The report evidently put the hooks in the wrong place.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] might change his report in that respect. I know Mr. Hooks and have known him for years. I believe him to be an honest man and that he had no connection with this matter at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. Take your report off the hooks, and let the case go through.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, it appeared in the statement made by the Paymaster-General when he submitted his report to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that committee in their report merely adopted the statement of the Paymaster-General. I desire the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] and the whole House to understand that it is not the object nor the intention of the Committee on Military Affairs to cast any unjust imputation upon the fair fame of this one-armed soldier. We do not make any reflection upon him at all, but merely copied what the Paymaster-General reported. I agree that that part of the report may be stricken out so far as it relates to Mr. Hooks.

When this case was up before the only question which at that time was deemed necessary to be considered was whether Major Hixson in the care of this money used such precaution as a man of ordinary prudence would use, and with the view of having that fact fully ascertained and established it was desired by some members of the House that Major Hixson should be brought here from his home in New York State to testify in that regard. I have a copy of his testimony in my hand at this time, which he delivered under oath, and I wish to call the attention of gentlemen to it. I ask the particular attention of those who may entertain some doubt as to the propriety of passing the bill.

In this testimony of Major Hixson, which he tells under oath, this question was asked him:

> Question. From the circumstances which surrounded you at the time, do you think you took proper care and custody of the money?
> Answer. I thought so; I felt so at the time. I did with it as I would have done with my own money, but, with the light of experience I have had, were it to be done over again I think I should run no risk of any kind, but should give the money my constant attention. But that was the practice.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we ought not to hold a Government official, and I believe it is not the rule in any branch of the Government service to hold an official to greater care and closer scrutiny than persons are held in other service as corporation officers, or than they would take of their own money.

It is very evident that Major Hixon lost his money. He was robbed. He swears he took all the care of that money he would have taken if it had been his own. The testimony is very clear that he is a man of high character; that he is an honest man, and in no respect defrauded the Government.

Paymaster-General Brice, as well as General Alvord, investigated this matter and satisfied themselves that this man ought not to be held accountable to the Government for that money. It is known that in many instances paymasters have been relieved by a law which is upon our statute-books whereby they are allowed a credit of $5,000 in the settlement of their accounts. This bill provides Major Hixson shall not have any excess of credit, and that the $5,000 he would have been entitled to shall be allowed to him in this appropriation, so that the appropriation for his relief would in the end amount only to $5,000.

This House during this session acted on two cases not any stronger than this one; the case of Major Underwood and the case of Colonel McClure, who came here for relief, having been short in their accounts, and they were relieved. Here is the evidence that this man, Major Hixson, was honest and faithful in the discharge of his duty, that he was as faithful and prudent in the care of this money as if it had been his own. The question now is whether the House will depart from the principle adopted in these other cases.

Now, I wish it to go upon record that I will be the last man in the world, the very last man upon the floor of this House, who would seek to do any injustice to a brave and gallant soldier, and if any injustice has been done to this one-armed soldier, Hooks, to whom the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has referred, I wish to say, as far as I am concerned, I am sorry for it. I trust that no imputation will be cast upon his record as a soldier, and that so much of this report as reflects upon him shall be stricken out.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I hope the attention of the committee may be given to this bill, for it seems to me that it involves an important principle. It will be remembered that this is the second time the bill has been before the committee for consideration. If it shall pass, it will set a precedent, it seems to me, which will be extremely dangerous.

This is a bill to relieve a paymaster of $10,000 which he alleges was stolen from him, and the only testimony of the loss is the testimony of the officer who asks to be relieved. Now, sir, if we set the precedent that paymasters may come here and have relief from Congress upon their own sole testimony, I apprehend that, as I have said, we will be setting an extremely dangerous precedent, and one that I hope this House will not adopt.

It will be remembered that there is an act, the act of May 9, 1866, which gives the Court of Claims jurisdiction of cases of this kind. But this claimant, as was stated in the debate when his claim was before the committee some time since, declined to go to the Court of Claims, because he has no testimony of the loss except his own single, unsupported testimony.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. He could not be a witness there. According to existing statutes he could not testify before the Court of Claims.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly not; and that is the very objection I am making to this claim. I am saying that to grant a claim which is to be sustained by the unsupported testimony of the claimant would lead to the most dangerous consequences. I hope this bill will not pass. I think it will be a great wrong.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Is the gentleman not aware that the Secretary of War and the Paymaster-General have recommended this? I think they know and understand about this matter a great deal better than the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The Paymaster-General knows nothing more about this than the committee do.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. The committee know something about it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And the Paymaster-General has no business to intrude his opinion on a question of this kind on Congress.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Not even when asked for it?

Mr. LAWRENCE. No. He has no more business to give his opinion than any other gentleman in the United States. It is not part of his official duty. It is an intrusion; it is thrusting his opinion upon Congress unasked, and when it is no part of his duty to do so. I say this would be a most dangerous bill to pass.

Mr. LAMPORT. I wish to relieve my friend, Major Hixson, from an impression that has perhaps obtained through an objection made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] That objection was made under an entire misapprehension. The gentleman from Indiana raised the objection, supposing that this bill had been in Congress before. I endeavored to correct him at the moment, but he was not satisfied and went to the committee-room. We explained the matter to him there, and he admitted that he knew nothing about the bill. Now, let there be no prejudice against the bill on that account.

I would not have occupied the time of the committee, only that I did not think any objection should obtain against Major Hixson because of the improper apprehension of the young man from Connecticut. It was not Major Hixson's doing. It was not at his suggestion. It was the work of the detectives. That therefore should not prejudice Major Hixson.

Mr. BARBER. Did he relieve him from the suspicion?

Mr. LAMPORT. He was imprisoned, and was then discharged because there was not sufficient proof against him.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that under the circumstances the point made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] is not a good one, because it was impossible for Major Hixson to bring any persons to prove that they saw a man stealing this money. That could not have been expected, and it would have been hardly possible. Major Hixson presents himself before this committee as an honorable man, and I venture this remark, that there is not one member of the Committee on Military Affairs who was present at his examination who does not believe him to be an honest and honorable man. He has represented his district in the Legislature of New York honorably. He is a farmer, a quiet, peaceable man, against whom no man would dare to breathe suspicion in his neighborhood, where he is known. It is true that much depends upon his own testimony. This is necessarily so. I trust the committee will consider the circumstances under which he was placed, and the very favorable report by the Committee on Military Affairs after a full and close examination. I trust the House will accept the testimony and grant relief.

And now I desire to say one word more upon my own responsibility, for which, perhaps, Major Hixson would not thank me. Major Hixson is a man in moderate circumstances. Without this relief he is bankrupt for life probably. He is not a trading, speculating man, and I think it would be sheer injustice under the circumstances not to relieve him.

Mr. BARBER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question. Does he consider it is indubitable evidence of honesty that a man has been a member of the New York Legislature?

Mr. LAMPORT. Perhaps not, that he has been a member of the New York Legislature; but if he had been a member of the Legislature of Wisconsin I would consider that was indubitable evidence.

The question was taken on laying aside the bill to be reported favorably to the House, and there were—ayes 81, noes 22; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered under the rule; and Mr. LAWRENCE and Mr. LAMPORT were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 78, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to, and the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 305) for the relief of Albert von Steinhousen, late major Sixty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry;

A bill (S. No. 529) to authorize an appointment in the Inspector-General's Department;

A bill (S. No. 552) to refund to E. & J. Koch certain customs duties; and

A bill (S. No. 629) for the relief of Osceola C. Green, administrator de bonis non and one of the heirs at law of Lieutenant Colonel Uriah Forrest.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 83) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to remove the powder magazine from Fort Norfolk, Norfolk, Virginia;

A bill (H. R. No. 345) to relieve certain persons therein named, late members of Company K, Fifty-eighth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, from the charge of mutiny;

A bill (H. R. No. 555) for the relief of McClintock Young, of the State of Maryland;

A bill (H. R. No. 725) for the relief of James C. Livingstone late a private in Company E, Third Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry;

A bill (H. R. No. 1201) authorizing the payment of prize-money to the officers and crew of the United States steamer Bienville;

A bill (H. R. No. 1404) for the relief of William F. Kerr;

A bill (H. R. No. 1776) for the relief of George Yount;

A bill (H. R. No. 1945) granting a pension to Juliet E. Hall, daughter of William Hall, late colonel of the Eleventh Regiment of Iowa Infantry;

A bill (H. R. No. 2086) for the relief of R. W. Clarke, postmaster at Brattleborough, Vermont; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2094) for the relief of William A. Snodgrass, late lieutenant Company H, Thirty-ninth Regiment Ohio Veteran Volunteer Infantry.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles, with amendments; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (H. R. No. 1948) granting a pension to Mary J. Blood; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2356) granting a pension to Edward Jardine, late colonel and brevet brigadier-general United States Volunteers.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 2081) to facilitate the exportation of distilled spirits, and amendatory of the acts in relation thereto; agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. ANTHONY, and Mr. STOCKTON conferees on the part of the Senate.

The Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar then resumed its session.

JAMES L. JOHNSON.

The next bill upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1924) for the relief of James L. Johnson, surviving partner of Beck & Johnson, authorizing payment for Indian depredations.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to James L. Johnson, the surviving partner of the firm of Preston Beck, jr., deceased, and James L. Johnson, merchants, of Santa Fé, New Mexico, the sum of $250, reported to Congress by the Court of Claims in report No. 290, Thirty-seventh Congress, second session, for the payment of the said sum of $250 by the United States to the said James L. Johnson, surviving partner of the firm of Beck & Johnson.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The claimant is the surviving partner of a firm composed of one Preston Beck, jr., deceased, and himself, doing business under the name of Beck & Johnson, at Santa Fé, New Mexico.

In 1867, as one of their wagon-trains was passing through the then Territory of Kansas, on its way to Santa Fé, it was approached by an armed band of Kiowa Indians, who, with threats of violence, took articles of clothing, &c., from the wagons and the men in charge. The latter, by taking their arms in their defense, intimidated the Indians. Articles of food, &c., were subsequently given them to prevent further depredations. After this, as the train was moving on, two of the mules in the train were shot and killed by one of the Indians.

Application for indemnity was presented to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in pursuance of the act of 1834. Indemnity not being thereby secured, the case was brought before the Court of Claims. Having been fully heard on the law and facts, and having fully and fairly tried, as appears from the report of the case, (No. 290, report of Court of Claims, second session, Thirty-seventh Congress,) the court found for the claimants, and found and estimated the damages at $250. This finding was made on the 9th of December, 1861.

In view of these facts, your committee return said bill, and recommend that it be amended by striking out all after the words "Beck & Johnson," in the thirteenth line, and that it, after being so amended, do pass.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That is a very short report, and discloses very little as to what the facts of the case are. I do not know but that this may be a very meritorious case, as meritorious as any that can be presented for the payment of Indian depredations. The purpose for which I rise is to oppose the bill upon principle. I do not believe that the Government of the United States is liable for any of these losses. I do not remember when the last bill making compensation for losses in consequence of Indian depredations was presented to the House or passed. Certainly no bill of that character has been presented for action before at this session. The subject-matter has been referred to the Committee on Claims and the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House. I suppose it would not properly come before any other committee, and I suppose it may be said that either of those committees may properly have jurisdiction of the subject. There are a great many bills of this character pending before the Committee on Claims—perhaps fully as many, and I do not know but more, than are pending before the Committee on Indian Affairs. For myself I am opposed to Congress admitting the liability of the Government of the United States to pay any of these claims.

I do not think the Government is liable for this claim. If we now begin to pay this character of claims, it must be well known to any gentleman who has given any consideration to the subject that there will be no end to them. I presume, if we begin in this Congress the payment of these claims, there will be more than $30,000,000 of them presented. I presume the State of Texas alone could present six or eight million dollars of claims of this character.

This case is not especially distinguished from any other. It appears by the report simply that the person making this claim was traveling along in one of our Territories, and the Indians attacked him and captured a portion of his mules; that is all that is stated. It is assumed that because they were taken by the Indians therefore the Government is liable. Nothing is stated to show any caution or care on the part of the person owning the mules; but the simple fact is stated that they were taken by the Indians, and therefore it is assumed that the Government of the United States is liable for them.

It further appears that this claim was presented to the Court of Claims, which found in 1861 that the amount of $250 was due. Now, the fact that this occurred many years ago, that the finding of the Court of Claims was made so long since, that Congress has never made any appropriation to pay it, is proof that, whatever the Court of Claims may have thought of it, Congress at least has not sanctioned the action of the court in that regard. Now, after the lapse of thirteen years, this party comes here and asks Congress to pay the amount found due by the Court of Claims. I know very well that years ago a great many of these claims were paid; I know it was a very common custom to pay them.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. DUNNELL. I understood the gentleman to say a moment since that the question was whether we should now begin to pay these claims.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. DUNNELL. Then how does the gentleman say that these claims were paid years ago?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I said that years ago we paid them, but so far as my knowledge extends there has been quite a long interval of time since we have paid them. I think I can show the gentleman that for a number of years Congress has been tending in the direction that it would not pay any of these claims. I can point the gentleman to the law of 1872, in which a provision was inserted requiring that these claims should be reported to Congress for such action as it might see proper to take. Congress called a halt upon this subject of Indian depredations; it no longer left it in the power of the Secretary of the Interior to pay these claims, however old or new they might be or however meritorious they might be. The jurisdiction of this subject was taken away from the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The Secretary of the Interior was required to present all these claims to Congress.

In virtue of that law, at the present session the Secretary of the Interior has reported several hundred cases, some of which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and some to the Committee on Claims. Although that law was passed in 1872, no action has ever been taken by Congress to pay these claims. If they are to be now paid, I wish this House to bear in mind that there are many million dollars of them that ought to be paid. And there ought to be some tribunal that shall examine them and judge of their merits, if we acknowledge that upon principle we are liable for them. Congress ought not to undertake to select out a few of them, as we will be obliged to do if the House acts upon them, and ignore the thousands of other claims which are just as meritorious. If these claims are just and the Government of the United States ought to pay them, there should be some commission before which they should go, as in the case of the claims from the Southern States. In that case we have a southern claims commission, before which claims of a certain character may go for examination. There they are passed upon; they all stand alike; each one has the same opportunity and the same chance that any other has.

But here, if Congress acknowledges at all the liability of the Government in the matter, and none of the claims are to have relief except such as Congress may relieve, there will be but very little relief given in any event. I suppose it is not improper for me to say that the Committee on Claims of the Senate have reported, I believe unanimously, under the instructions of the Senate, that the United States is not liable for these claims; that it is liable neither to the States or Territories nor to private individuals for this class of claims. Therefore when I say that the tendency has been in the direction that Congress is not liable for these claims, I am borne out by the fact that the Senate committees having jurisdiction of this subject, under the instructions of the Senate, have reported to that body at the present session that there is no legal liability on the part of the Government.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does the gentleman understand that that report applies to claims for damages to the property of private citizens, or simply to claims for expenses of troops raised in the Territories for Indian warfare?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I will read the first sentence or two of the report of the Senate committee:

> The proposition submitted by the resolution of the Senate is whether an obligation rests upon the Government of the United States to reimburse States and Territories and the citizens thereof for expenses and damages sustained by reason of incursions of hostile Indians.
> The committee are not able to perceive upon what grounds such obligation can be supposed to arise.

Mr. COMINGO. Does that report apply to the law as it now stands on our statute-books?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I presume it does. I am stating (and I am glad the gentleman agrees with me) that the law as it now stands on the statute-book does not bind the United States for any of these losses. There is no law now in force by which the Government is liable for any of these damages.

Mr. COMINGO. No positive law.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. No law whatever. There is no law binding either the Government of the United States or any Department thereof to pay such losses.

We now have here two bills reported by the gentleman from Missouri from the Committee on Indian Affairs. He asks that while there is no law on the statute-book making the United States liable to pay such losses, these two cases shall be selected from among all the claims now in existence and shall be paid. I repeat that I am glad to find the gentleman from Missouri agreeing with me that there is no law binding the United States in these cases.

It may be said, perhaps truly, that Congress has not definitely settled the policy in reference to this subject. It has repealed such laws as were in force recognizing the liability of the United States to pay such claims. It has been provided that the Secretary of the Interior shall at each session of Congress send to us all the claims pending in his Department for Indian depredations. That law has been complied with. In pursuance of it these claims are now here, having been sent here by the Secretary of the Interior under the law of 1872 which was ingrafted upon an appropriation bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the question presented to the House is this: while it is conceded that there is no law now in force making the United States liable for these losses, shall we pass a law that shall bind the United States and oblige us to pay them?

Mr. COMINGO. I do not agree that there is no law fixing the liability of the United States. I say there is no statute law fixing that liability at this time.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. If there is no statute law, what law can there be?

Mr. COMINGO. I will show the gentleman as soon as I can have an opportunity.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. If the gentleman says there is no statute law binding this Government, I think he may as well be silent when I ask him what law does bind the Government in this way.

Mr. COMINGO. I will show the gentleman.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I had supposed that unless we were bound either by the law or by the Constitution we were not obliged to do anything toward the payment of these claims. The gentleman may say that there is a higher law, an imperative moral obligation that requires us to pay for these depredations. But, Mr Chairman, I ask, in all candor——

Mr. COMINGO. There is no statute law that makes the Government liable for spoliations of this kind that are now committed; but there is a law making the United States responsible for this particular spoliation.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I do not so understand it.

Mr. COMINGO. I will show the gentleman that I am right.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I do not understand that there is any law in force at this time that makes the Government liable for any depredations that have been committed at any time. Upon principle I should like to know why the Government of the United States is responsible for losses of this character any more than for all the losses incurred by loyal citizens during the war. Why should Congress be called upon to pay for losses incurred by reason of Indian raids or depredations, any more than to pay for losses which were suffered by the people of Indiana and Pennsylvania during the late war? Whole counties, whole districts of country in those States were overrun by the enemy during the war; certainly it was so in Pennsylvania. In that way millions of dollars' worth of property was destroyed. The sufferers were loyal men, who had always adhered to the Government and were entitled to its protection. Certainly if any one should be allowed claims for losses of such character, these men ought to be reimbursed. Yet we have never paid such claims. I do not know that any gentleman in this House has ever acknowledged the liability of the Government for such losses. Now, if we are not to pay losses sustained by our loyal citizens in loyal States, I should like to know upon what principle we are to pay these Indian losses which, as I have said, will certainly amount to the neighborhood of twenty or thirty millions, and perhaps will exceed that sum.

I do not wish to occupy unnecessarily the time of the House. My mind is deliberately made up on this subject. I think we ought not to pay this class of claims. If Congress by passing any of these claims acknowledges the liability of the Government, where will the matter end and how shall we escape an acknowledgment of our liability to pay at least all claims equally meritorious? If Congress is in any way to acknowledge liability for these losses, there should be some method provided for considering all the claims upon an equal footing; there should be some tribunal by which evidence can be heard for and against claims, and by which they may be fairly and equitably adjusted.

Mr. COMINGO. Before making any remarks in support of this bill, I ask that Report No. 95 may be read, as the gentleman from Illinois complains that the report in this case is very meager. The cases are identical; they grew out of the same trespass or spoliation.

The Clerk read as follows:

> The claimant is administrator of the estate of Preston Beck, jr., deceased and as such he seeks to recover the sum of $6,565.65, on account of depredations committed by the Navajo Indians, about the 12th of September, 1849.

Claimant's intestate and one Robert J. Brent were partners, doing business at Santa Fé, New Mexico. Brent was killed by Indians in November, 1852. The property taken from said firm consisted of mules and horses. It was kept near the city of Santa Fé, in New Mexico, and was driven by said Indians into the Navajo country. No part of it was ever recovered. Application was made for indemnification by Beck & Brent to the superintendent of Indians affairs, as required by section 17, act 1834, 4 Statutes at Large, 731, but they failed to recover indemnity. Subsequent to this, claimant as administrator, &c., commenced an action in the Court of Claims, alleging the damages to be $8,710, and asking an allowance of interest.

The cause was ably defended by the Government solicitor, and after being fully heard and considered, the court found for the claimant the sum of $6,565, but refused to allow interest on the claim. In the opinion of your committee, the conclusion reached by the court is fully sustained by the law and the facts of the case.

All the proceedings in the cause, together with the testimony received by the court at the trial, and the briefs of the counsel, are fully reported in Reports of Court of Claims, second session Thirty-seventh Congress, volume 1, No. 282.

It is worthy of remark that there is a dissenting opinion in the case by one of the justices, Scarburgh; but it relates to but one point, and that one which had been decided adversely to the claimant. The whole court concurred in the opinion that the Government was legally liable and bound to pay the damages sustained; but a majority held, and your committee thinks correctly, that interest could not be allowed for the time that intervened between the act of spoliation and the decision of the cause. This was made early in March, 1861. In the dissenting opinion it is held that interest ought to be allowed and paid on the value of the property taken, from the time it was taken, &c. It is not necessary, however, to consider this question here, as it was settled by the decision of the court. Nor has your committee deemed it necessary to pass upon the question of interest that may have accrued since the cause was decided by the Court of Claims in the bill under consideration. The claimant seeks to recover only the sum found in his favor by the court, and does not ask that interest be added. Inasmuch, however, as claimant's counsel in his brief, submitted to the committee, asked and argued that interest should be allowed, it is deemed proper to state that the question was not considered.

Your committee herewith return said bill (H. R. No. 1338) and recommend that it be passed with the following amendments:

Strike out the words "and sixty-five cents" at the end of the seventh and beginning of the eighth line.

Second. Strike out all after the word "session" in the eleventh line.

Mr. COMINGO. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the House to the law. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] when he said I conceded there is no law authorizing the payment of this claim entirely misapprehended my remarks if he so understood me. I say there is a positive law demanding the payment of the claim, and we cannot without disregarding the law of the land refuse to pay it. I will admit, so far as the statutes of the United States are now concerned, all those provisions by which citizens were to be indemnified for damages arising from trespasses of Indians have been repealed. Still I go further and insist notwithstanding there is no positive statute that will indemnify the citizen for the injuries he may sustain at the hands of these Indians, the liability of the United States exists. It is not necessary we should discuss this proposition now. I am ready to discuss it at the proper time and place, but it is a feature which does not present itself in this case at all.

I will remark, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the Indians are the wards of the Government, the wards of the people of the United States, inasmuch as we by positive law forbid our citizens who have had outrages committed upon them by these Indians to pursue the Indians and seek redress themselves by their own efforts, we thereby, I say, make ourselves morally and equitably liable for every offense these Indians may commit, and for the damages which may result from trespass upon citizens of the United States. But I will remark again I do not intend to discuss that question here. I plant myself on the law which must control in this case, the law which existed at the time this claim accrued, and I defy gentlemen to controvert my position unless they are disposed to refuse to pay the honest debts of the United States.

I will remark just here in passing that the idea seems to obtain that we are not responsible for the debts of the Government, because we are unable to pay them. There are various Indian claims—I have been considering one this morning—the payment of which has heretofore been refused because the amount was greater than it was thought the people were able to pay. We are refusing to pay thousands and millions of dollars simply on the plea we are unable to pay. It is as mean and infamous as the plea of infancy. If it is a just demand, if we are legally and equitably liable to pay this or any other claim against the Government of the United States, I say it comes with bad grace from us to say we will not pay because they are too numerous. The citizen cannot protect himself in that way, nor should the Government endeavor to protect itself, or the representatives of the Government endeavor to protect the Government from the payment of these claims on any such plea as that.

Mr. Chairman, in 1859, at the time this act of spoliation—I may call it such—was committed, there was a positive law making the Government of the United States responsible. As early as 1802, if I mistake not in regard to the date, and dates are not important, the Government of the United States recognized this responsibility to the citizen in cases of this sort. In 1834 another act was passed by which the Government recognized its liability and positively promised to pay the citizen for damages which might result by the trespass of these Indians. In 1859, if I mistake not, there was an act of Congress passed which repealed all the provisions of the act of 1834 fixing this liability upon the Government. But I ask gentlemen to bear in mind before this act was repealed this trespass was committed and this spoliation was made by these Indians with whom we were on terms of amity and with whom we had a treaty.

The question here arises, perhaps, whether that deprived the citizen of his remedy—whether that deprived the citizen of his remedy as against the Government of the United States. That question immediately arises, but for a joint resolution passed by Congress. I send it to the Clerk's desk that it may be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

A resolution explanatory of the eighth section of the act of Congress approved February 28, 1859.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the repeal of the eighth section of the act of Congress approved the 28th day of February, 1859, of so much of the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," approved June 30, 1834, as provides that the United States shall make indemnification out of the Treasury for property taken or destroyed in certain cases by Indians trespassing on white men, as described in said act, shall not be construed to destroy or impair any right to indemnity which existed at the date of said repeal.

Approved June 25, 1860.

Mr. COMINGO. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask gentlemen to bear in mind, when they are talking about the non-liability of the United States, that the Congress of the United States itself recognized its liability to pay these very claims and all other claims of a similar character. Although by a positive enactment in 1859 the people of the United States, through their representatives, said that they would no longer pay this class of claims, or pay for damages that resulted from the violence of Indians, they saw the manifest injustice that that law would operate, so far at all events as claims existing at that time and whose existence dated back anterior to the passage of the repealing act were concerned, and passed that joint resolution. It will be borne in mind that it is shown by the reports which have been read at the Clerk's desk that this trespass was committed in 1859, before the act was repealed.

I do not conceive that it is necessary that I should undertake to show to the committee that that is a valid claim, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAWLEY] intimated I should have done in the report, or that I should undertake to show that the claimants have used due diligence to protect themselves properly, because a court of competent jurisdiction has passed on this whole question, as I have stated in the very brief report which has been read at the Clerk's desk. As stated in the report, this case was carefully considered by the Court of Claims; and it was deliberately determined by that court that the liability of the Government existed, that it could not be questioned; that all the facts existed that were necessary to make the Government responsible for the damages that resulted from this trespass.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question for information. In the report it is stated that the Court of Claims passed a favorable verdict on this case in December, 1861. I desire to inquire why it is that the claim has slept so long, thirteen years having passed away since then?

Mr. COMINGO. I can explain that very easily. In the first place, the Government is a very bad paymaster. There are too many on this floor who are disposed to put off the day of paying a Government debt. That is one reason. And another reason may be, though I am not prepared to say positively that such is the case, that during the war this claim may have slumbered. But the lapse of time in this regard raises no suspicion against its justice.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask whether the claimant himself has made any effort at all to bring the matter to an adjustment?

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. When did he first apply?

Mr. COMINGO. I will answer one question at a time. I will answer the gentleman from Ohio that the claim may have been, for aught I know, pending in this Congress before. I believe it has been before the Committee on Claims, though I am not fully informed as to that. I am prepared, however, to state that I have made an examination, and find that there is no adverse report so far as I have been able to ascertain the facts in regard to this case. There has not been an adverse report, though the case may have slumbered in the pigeonholes of the committee with others which have been put away there and never examined.

The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PARKER] asks when the claim was first presented. I am not prepared to state. But I am prepared to say that it is now properly presented. It was introduced by the Delegate from New Mexico, and the parties are now here asking Congress to pay this claim; and I ask you is there any good reason why you shall not pay it?

The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. PARKER] says that they have in New Hampshire a statute of limitations. I do not know that we have any that will apply in this case, and I hope there is in this House too much respect for the character of the Government to apply it here.

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. It seems very remarkable that this man should put off pressing this claim for thirteen years.

Mr. COMINGO. I would remark that, as a general rule, the Government I believe has hitherto refused to plead the statute of limitations.

Mr. SPEER. Did not the claimant himself die?

Mr. COMINGO. Yes; the claimant died subsequent to the time when the right of action accrued, and his administrator commenced prosecuting the case in the Court of Claims as soon as he could, and he recovered a judgment in his favor.

I will remark that, as is stated in the report, there was no division of opinion among the members of the court in regard to the liability of the Government to pay this debt, for I can call it nothing else. The whole court concurred in the opinion that the Government was liable, and that all the facts existed and had been clearly established that were necessary to fix the liability on the Government. The only difference of opinion in the court was that one of the justices held that the Government ought to pay interest, and that there could be no complete act of reparation unless the Government would come up, as an honest man would do, and pay interest on the claim. That was the only difference that existed in the court. It was not divided upon any question that related to the merits of the case.

I do not wish to occupy too much time in this discussion; and inasmuch as I wish to let the committee see what has been done in this case, I propose to send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a part of the opinion of the court that passed on the case. I repeat that it was an undivided opinion with reference to the justice and validity of the claim, and only divided as to the measure of relief that ought to be granted. I wish I had time to take the record and bring before the committee all the facts that bear on the case. If there is anything that the claimant might have done that he did not do in order to secure this indemnity, I have been unable to see what it is. He came first before the Secretary of the Interior and then before the Court of Claims, and got a judgment there, as I have already stated. If anything might have been done which he has not done it would have been to have been more diligent, or for his representative to have been more diligent, in pressing the claim before the Congress of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COMINGO. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am anxious about this case in so far as it is possible that it may be a test case. I understand that this case was tried by the Court of Claims. I am anxious to know whether it was sent to them by a special act, or under some general law. Is the gentleman able to inform me?

Mr. COMINGO. I think it was sent there by the Secretary of the Interior at the request of the claimant. But let me say to the gentleman that this cannot be a test case, because it does not present the point that will necessarily arise in every case subsequent to the act of 1859 repealing the act of 1834.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand that it cannot be a test case at all of our general obligation to remunerate persons for Indian depredations.

Mr. COMINGO. It cannot.

Mr. GARFIELD. But it may be a test case for all that class of cases, that under any law have gone to the Court of Claims, growing out of Indian troubles. I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on Claims that a large number of such cases may come to us through the Court of Claims; and our action in this case may be a precedent for all cases of the kind.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman from Missouri if any Indian claim could possibly have come before the Court of Claims at any time unless it was specially referred there by law? The general law giving that court jurisdiction does not give it jurisdiction of Indian claims. It is very common for Congress to refer specific claims of all sorts to the Court of Claims for the court to pass upon.

Mr. COMINGO. I desire to ask the gentleman a question right there which may save some trouble. Does he deny the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I say that the Court of Claims has no jurisdiction unless some special act has been passed referring the claim to it, for the general law creating that court certainly does not give them jurisdiction in such cases.

Mr. COMINGO. The question of jurisdiction was raised in the court and determined.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I can show you by the law organizing the court that it never had jurisdiction of this class of claims generally; it never had such jurisdiction unless the claim was specially referred to it.

Mr. LOWE. I think we may naturally presume that the court would not have taken jurisdiction unless they had it either under a general or special law.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. That was the point I was making, that they could not have jurisdiction unless the case had been specially referred to them.

Mr. LOWE. It must have been referred by some special act.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman from Missouri yields to me for a single remark. I must say that I am somewhat surprised at the several special pleas that are put in against this claim which the gentleman from Missouri is advocating. The first one seems to be that the United States has not been called upon to pay this claim as early as it ought to have been; in other words, that the United States has been indulged a little further than it ought to have been, and that the statute of limitations ought to be applied. I do not think there is any such statute. The statute of limitations is never allowed to run against the Government of the United States, and I hope the Government of the United States is too generous, too good, too upright a debtor to plead the statute of limitations in any case. It is an infamous plea to be put in in behalf of anybody, and I hope it will not be put in in behalf of the Government of the United States.

Another plea is put in which seems to me to be perfectly absurd, ridiculous, and beneath the dignity of the Government of the United States. We have established a Court of Claims. For what? To determine what the United States owes to its citizens. This Court of Claims, established by the United States, has determined and tried this case, with power of appeal on behalf of the United States to the highest tribunal of this country. Yet gentlemen come in here and tell us that a case tried in the Court of Claims and determined in favor of the claimant is to be rejected by the House, although the United States has taken no appeal. It is an absolute absurdity, and it seems to me that both of these pleas ought to be rejected. I am not prepared to say whether this claim is a just one or not, but I do say the defenses set up here in the House of Representatives are beneath the Government of the United States.

Mr. COMINGO. I did not expect when I presented this small claim that it would raise such a storm, or that the few remarks that I intended to make would be interlarded with so many or so long remarks by others. The question of jurisdiction was raised in this case by a court competent to determine its jurisdiction. I am not now prepared to state, nor do I deem it important, in what manner the court got jurisdiction, or in what manner this case was brought before the Court of Claims. But jurisdiction was exercised, and I believe exercised rightfully. In view of the fact that the case was before the court and that the court expressed their opinion of the law of the Government to pay this claim, we have reported it to the House. I ask the Clerk to read from the decisions of the Court of Claims the passages which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

The petitioner is administrator de bonis non of Preston Beck, who was the surviving partner of Brent & Beck, merchants of Santa Fé, in the Territory of New Mexico. The petitioner claims indemnification by the United States for a herd of mules, &c., of which Brent & Beck were plundered by the Navajo Indians on the 12th of September, 1849, and the claim is made upon the statute of 30th June, 1834, as that is explained by the joint resolution of June 25, 1860.

The facts shown are, that about the 12th of September, 1849, a band or herd of mules, mares, &c., belonging to Brent & Beck, were pastured by them under the charge of herdsmen on the plains or mesa in the county of Santa Fé, and about twelve miles from the city of Santa Fé; that a body of Navajo Indians seized them and drove them off into the Navajo country; that on the 29th of November, 1851, Brent & Beck made application to the superintendent of Indian affairs, and filed with him their claim for indemnification for the animals stolen, and the proofs of their loss, under and according to the seventeenth section of the statute of 1834. The claim was not paid or allowed, and since it accrued no annuity has been granted to the Navajo Indians. The petitioner claims to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States the sum of $8,710, with interest thereon from one year after filing his proof.

* * * * * * *

Thus the Navajoes committed the depredation when their tribe was in amity with the United States, and passed from the Indian country into a Territory inhabited by citizens of the United States; and this brings the claim of the petitioner within the seventeenth section of the act of 1834.

That the mules and animals taken belonged to Brent & Beck is admitted in the brief of the solicitor, and we think is shown by the evidence, (pages 7, 8, 9.) As to the number of animals taken, Montalla says, (page 8:) "I think there was a hundred head." Duval, who had charge of the herd, says, (page 9:) "There were about eighty mules, sixteen mares, and a few horses, colts, and jackasses." He thus enumerates ninety-eight animals, and the phrase "a few horses and colts," taken, as it should be, at its least extent, adds three to the enumeration, making one hundred and one animals in all.

Then as to the average value of the animals, Duval and Estes state it at seventy-five dollars a head. J. S. Collins, a deponent for the petitioner, says the general range of prices for mules that year was about sixty to eighty dollars, and the petitioners, in the proof filed by them before the superintendent in support of their claim and which they produced here, stated the value of the animals to be sixty-five dollars per head, which we think the fair conclusion as to their value from the evidence; and one hundred and one animals at sixty-five dollars per head gives a total of $6,565.

The petitioner claims interest on the ground that the seventeenth section of the act of 1834 provides for the party injured "an eventual indemnification;" but by the express terms of the statute such eventual indemnification is to be "in respect to the property so taken, stolen, or destroyed." These words must have some meaning or they would not have been used; and if any effect is allowed them it must be restrictive, and the whole sentence does not of its own force indicate more than the value of the property taken, &c., or create an obligation on the part of the United States to pay interest for the default or delay of the Indians in satisfying, or of the officers of the Government in enforcing, the claims of parties injured.

On the whole case we are of opinion that the petitioner is entitled to relief in the sum of $6,565, for which a bill will be reported to Congress. * * *

Is the petitioner entitled to relief? Brent and Beck were citizens of the United States and partners in trade, and the property taken by the Navajoes was a part of their social effects, and the petitioner is the personal representative of Preston Beck, who survived his partner, Robert T. Brent, also deceased. My opinion is that he is entitled to the "indemnification" guaranteed by the seventeenth section of the act of 1834. This case comes clearly within the provision of that section, as adopted by the treaty of September 9, A. D. 1849. Navajo Indians, after the date of that treaty, passed from the Navajo country into the Territory of New Mexico, and there forcibly took the property of Brent & Beck, and Brent & Beck have complied with the seventeenth section of the act of 1834 in all respects.

But what is the "indemnification" guaranteed by the seventeenth section of the act of 1834? That section makes it the duty of the superintendent of Indian affairs, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, to make application, under the directions of the President, to the Navajoes for satisfaction; and, in respect to the property taken, guarantees to the parties injured "an eventual indemnification." We need not pause to inquire into the meaning of the word "satisfaction" in this statute. It were easy to show that, if used in such a connection in a treaty between nations, it would include both the value of the property taken and interest upon such value. But "indemnification" is the word with which we have to deal here. It means compensation for loss, reimbursement of a loss sustained. The reimbursement contemplated was not immediate, but eventual. It was guaranteed to the party injured, but to be paid to him after the United States had had a reasonable time to obtain satisfaction from the offending Indians. Not only was it an eventual, not an immediate indemnification, but it was an indemnification in respect to the property only, not in respect to any personal wrong or any loss which the party injured may have otherwise sustained. After the lapse of a reasonable time for the United States to obtain satisfaction, if no annuity is payable by them to the tribe or nation to which the offending Indians belong, the party injured becomes entitled to have the amount of his claim, that is the "eventual indemnification," paid from the Treasury of the United States. During all this time he is restrained from seeking or attempting to obtain private satisfaction or revenge. He is suffering from the loss of his property, but the law assures him eventual indemnification. Let it be supposed that in this case Brent & Beck, relying upon this assurance, had immediately after their loss supplied themselves with other stock of like value with that taken from them, and had borrowed the money necessary for that purpose, and that now, after the lapse of more than twelve years, the principal only should be paid them. The amount paid would do little more than reimburse to them simple interest on their debt, leaving the larger portion of the debt unsatisfied. Would this be eventual indemnification? The law said wait, and ultimately you shall be indemnified. They do wait, and are indemnified in part only. What would have been indemnification in respect to the property taken immediately after it was taker, falls far short of indemnification when paid after the expiration of more than twelve years. My opinion is that the words of this statute, according to their true intent and meaning, cannot be satisfied without giving to the claimant not only the value of the property taken at the time when it was taken, but also interest thereon. On this point I dissent from the opinion of the court. (See opinion of Scarburgh, J., in Letitia Humphreys vs. The United States.)

Mr. COMINGO. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say very little in addition to what I have already stated; but I desire to disabuse the minds of members of an impression which may have been created by a remark of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] that this is to become a test case. I am sorry that we have not now before the House a case that can be treated as a test question for all trespasses that have been committed by Indians since the repeal of the law which has been referred to. Without discussing that question at this time, (for it is unnecessary to do so,) I will state my belief that such liability exists, and that it becomes our duty to protect citizens who suffer from depredations of Indians.

This claim, however, can only be made a test case so far as it may authorize or require the allowance of claims that are similarly situated. It grows out of a state of facts that existed prior to the repeal of the law referred to. I hope members will bear in mind that such is the fact. More than that, this case has been passed upon by a court of competent jurisdiction. After a careful examination of all the law bearing upon the question, and of all the facts, a court selected by the Government itself, and sworn to discharge its duty, (and that it has done so in this case must be apparent to any one who will examine the record,) has passed upon this question and declared that the Government is responsible for the payment of this claim.

The only plausible objection I have heard to the payment of the claim is that this claimant has not been in quite as much haste as he should have been. Had he pursued his claim with more avidity, I presume it would be stripped of some objections which now lie against it in the minds of members. But upon an examination of the facts as they appeared before the committee, and as they appear on the record, we considered that the liability of the Government was established. All these facts are to be overturned, if overturned at all, by the simple fact that the claimant has not been as diligent in his efforts to recover what is due him as he might have been. If this rule is to apply to claimants against the Government, how many claims are there for which the Government will be held responsible? How many are there that ought to be paid or will be paid? Very few, I presume, because the Government has power to put off claimants from time to time. After knocking at the door of the Treasury day after day and year after year, a claimant may go away in despair simply because those who represent the Government have seen fit to defer an act of justice to a private citizen.

When the proper time comes I hope I shall have an opportunity to be heard on this question of the liability of the Government to pay those claims which the gentleman from Illinois says he has put in his pigeonhole. Although they may amount to $20,000,000, or vastly more than that, I say they are just claims; and no man, I think, can satisfy his conscience by saying that he will not pay them because the amount is so great. I insist that these claims ought to be paid because they are meritorious.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does this bill include interest?

Mr. COMINGO. It does not. The court itself refused to allow interest up to the time the judgment was rendered. Interest is not asked for in this bill; nor do I suppose the committee would have allowed it if it had been asked. We simply come and ask Congress to ratify the act of a court of its own appointment and ordination. If this be not done, I hope some better reason will be shown than any hitherto offered in opposition to this bill.

I yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.]

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire only to say that Mr. Preston Beck, whose name appears in this proceeding, is an old friend of mine—a school-boy friend; and hence I have been induced to take some interest in this claim. I investigated it very closely four or five years ago, though I have not heard of it since. I have entire confidence in the justice of the claim, and in the correctness of the assertions made as to the losses sustained by these parties. I feel satisfied also as to the propriety of making the Government liable in such cases, especially as the Court of Claims has recognized this as a valid claim. I am acquainted, too, with some of the parties who are pressing this claim, and I take pleasure in saying that I regard it as an honest claim in every respect. I shall vote for it very cheerfully.

Mr. SHANKS. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to antagonize this bill, and I wish to make entirely clear the reason why I do not oppose it, for I should oppose any bill that might be presented here to pay for damages committed by Indians since February 28, 1859. But as the damages in this case were committed prior to that time, and as by a joint resolution passed by Congress in 1860 claims for damages prior to February 28, 1859, were protected from the operation of the repealing statute, and inasmuch as the Court of Claims has passed upon this question in pursuance of the law previously in force, I think the bill ought to pass. But I cannot indorse the doctrine which has been declared by my colleague on the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. COMINGO,] for whom I have the highest regard, both as to his legal talent and his integrity, the doctrine that the Government of the United States is liable for any depredations committed by Indians since February 28, 1859. I believe no such liability can exist until we shall have passed a statute expressly creating the obligation.

There have been some cases on that point here. Indeed I took part in having a statute passed for a woman who had been a prisoner, who had lost her property and been badly treated, but who did good service to the country while in the hands of the Indians by sending word to our troops. That was a particular case, however. When a particular case arises I am willing to consider it and pass judgment on it.

But, Mr. Chairman, so far as the statute law is concerned, the law of 1834 which held the Indian fund liable when the Indians had funds, was considered in 1872 to be wrong, for the reason that it held the fund of the Indian tribe liable for damages done only by a few Indians. So much, then, for the injustice done to the Indians themselves by the law which took for the act of a few persons the fund of a whole tribe of Indians. That, however, was repealed; and it is not claimed now that any Indian fund is liable for the depredations committed by Indians.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The original act which required the Government should make indemnification looked to indemnity from the Indians. Has not this claim been delayed so long that the Government can get indemnity from the Indians?

Mr. SHANKS. On that point I say the law anticipated the damages should be taken out of the Indian fund, but it provided in express terms if not paid out of the Indian fund, if there was no Indian fund for that purpose, the United States should be liable. That was the law until February 28, 1859. Then Congress absolutely abolished the liability of the United States for depredations by Indians. It was careful to preserve liability against the Indians. That was repealed by the law of 1872.

The gentleman from Ohio puts the question whether the United States is not released because it was not taken out of the Indian fund. No, for the reason that the law declared if there was not an Indian fund for that purpose the United States should be liable. Therefore the liability was fixed. The resolution of 1860 secured that liability and let it go in favor of this claim. The Court of Claims have determined the amount, and it is not necessary, therefore, to controvert that point.

But a word as to the question of liability now. From 1859 up to this time I do not believe—and I wish expressly to state—I do not believe there is a particle of liability for any damages done by Indians.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Let me ask the gentleman one question right there. The gentleman from Indiana as well as the gentleman from Missouri has developed some facts which are not contained in the report. Do they now say there is no liability on the part of the Government to pay for any Indian depredations?

Mr. SHANKS. I think not.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Then why pay these?

Mr. SHANKS. Not for any claim which accrued after the 28th of February, 1859.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Is there for those arising before?

Mr. SHANKS. That may or may not be according to circumstances. It would be when the fact was shown that the depredations were committed by Indians with whom we were not at war at that time. If we were at war with them then, according to the statute we are not liable.

It is claimed because the Indians were not at war the nation is responsible. I do not understand that the guardian is responsible for any act of the ward done in violation of law, or that the parent is responsible for any act of the child done in violation of law. I do not understand it in that way, and especially when the statute expressly states that they are not liable.

Therefore, sir, from the 28th of February, 1859, up to this time, we are not liable for the depredations of Indians. And this is all I wish to say. I merely wish to put squarely upon the record my opinion that in reporting bills from the Committee on Indian Affairs I do not wish to be held responsible for any bill for damages which accrued since 1859, when the damages were committed by Indians.

Mr. LOWE. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to say a few words on this bill. The bill itself does not naturally and necessarily present the general question of the liability of the Government of the United States for depredations committed by the Indians. It stands on a basis of its own, having been supported by the judgment of the Court of Claims and coming before the statute which repealed the indemnity or guarantee act of 1834. But inasmuch as this bill or the measure which it embraces has been assailed on the other side of the general question of the liability of the Government for Indian depredations, I desire to say a few words upon the bill in that regard, for it may be that the idea and the belief promulgated by some members of this committee that under no circumstances is the Government liable for these depredations, would fail to induce votes against this measure which they would otherwise give for it.

Now, sir, this measure may be regarded in two aspects: First, as to the legal liability of the Government in respect to claims of this kind; and second, in respect to the proper policy of the Government in regard to such claims. It may be, Mr. Chairman, that there is no legal liability on the part of the Government of the United States to pay this or many other such claims; and yet it may be a proper measure of policy, it may be a proper exercise of legislative discretion, to grant indemnity and relief in cases of this kind. Sir, why is it that we have a private-bill day, week after week, for passing bills in aid of certain individuals or in aid of certain interests? Why was it that, by the bill immediately preceding this one on the Calendar, we voted $10,000 to a single individual? I heard no gentleman on this floor, I heard no member of this committee, undertake to allege that there was a legal liability on the part of the Government to pay those $10,000. I heard that bill urged as a question of policy, as a question of equity, as a question of natural justice; and if a policy is to be adopted by this committee, if the view is to be adopted by this House that no money is to be voted under any circumstances or for any parties or for any purposes, except for those parties and those purposes in respect to which a legitimate and absolute legal liability can be advanced, then we may dispense with very much of our ordinary and legitimate legislation.

Sir, in regard to this question, I have to say that if we now refuse to pay all classes of claims of this kind we are starting upon a new policy. My friend, the chairman of the Committee on Claims, has asked the question whether we are now to start upon a new policy of paying these claims arising from Indian depredations. I answer, Mr. Chairman, that if we stop the policy of paying these claims, we inaugurate a new policy instead of following that which has been the policy from the foundation of the Government.

The act of 1834, I believe, has been already read in the hearing of the committee. That act of 1834, which was but a repetition of the act of 1802, contained two or three salient provisions which established the policy of this Government and from which it seems to me we ought not now to depart. The policy adopted by those statutes was a practical division of the country into the Indian country and the general body of the country subject to its ordinary laws. It prohibited in fact the introduction, the transportation, or the traveling into the Indian country of the white citizens of the country. It prohibited Indians from going into the settled portions of the country. And for the purpose of protecting both the rights of the Indians and the rights of the white citizens, it provided that where any white citizens entered the Indian country, and committed spoliation or took the property of the Indians, the Indians should be indemnified out of the Treasury of the United States. It also provided that if any Indian, or a member of any Indian tribe, with whom the United States was at peace, went beyond the Indian country and committed any depredation upon the property of any white citizen, or if within the Indian country he took the property of any white citizen, indemnity should be made to the white citizen out of the annuities or property of the tribes if they had any, and if not they should be indemnified out of the Treasury of the United States.

That was the law of this land from 1802 down to 1849. Now, sir, I assert that that policy has been the policy of the Government from its foundation, and if we change now that policy it ought to be changed for some sufficient reason, and for some good purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I thought that this law of 1834 had been read at the desk; but I am informed that it has not. I now send it to the Clerk's desk and ask that the seventeenth section of the non-intercourse act may be read.

Mr. LAWRENCE. What is the date?

Mr. LOWE. Eighteen hundred and thirty-four. It is a transcript almost of the act of 1802.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That if any Indian or Indians belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States shall, within the Indian country, take or destroy the property of any person lawfully within such country, or shall pass from the Indian country into any State or Territory inhabited by citizens of the United States and there take, steal, or destroy any horse, horses, or other property belonging to any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, such citizen or inhabitant, his representative, attorney, or agent, may make application to the proper superintendent, agent, or sub-agent, who, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, shall, under the direction of the President, make application to the nation or tribe to which said Indian or Indians shall belong for satisfaction; and if such nation or tribe shall neglect or refuse to make satisfaction in a reasonable time, not exceeding twelve months, it shall be the duty of such superintendent, agent, or sub-agent, to make return of his doings to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that such further steps may be taken as shall be proper, in the opinion of the President, to obtain satisfaction for the injury; and in the mean time, in respect to the property so taken, stolen, or destroyed, the United States guarantees to the party so injured an eventual indemnification: Provided, That if such injured party, his representative, attorney, or agent, shall in any way violate any of the provisions of this act by seeking or attempting to obtain private satisfaction or revenge, he shall forfeit all claim upon the United States for such indemnification: And provided also, That unless such claim shall be presented within three years after the commission of the injury the same shall be barred. And if the nation or tribe to which such Indian may belong receive an annuity from the United States, such claim shall at the next payment of the annuity be deducted therefrom and paid to the party injured; and if no annuity is payable to such nation or tribe, then the amount of the claim shall be paid from the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the legal apprehension and punishment of any Indians having so offended.

Mr. LOWE. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Unless the gentleman desires to make further remarks upon the subject generally, I wish to say one word to him.

Mr. LOWE. I do desire it. It will be observed by the reading of that act that the statement which I made as to its contents is verified, and that the United States there guarantees to every white citizen whose property is taken under the circumstances there mentioned an indemnity out of the public Treasury of the United States. Other sections of that non-intercourse act, which are still in force, prohibit any citizen of the United States from entering the Indian country for the purpose of seeking any reclamation for property which may have been destroyed. Those sections of the act of 1834 are not repealed, and although a portion of that seventeenth section has been repealed, the indemnity which it guarantees has not been repealed to the extent which the gentleman from Indiana now claims. I ask the Clerk to read the eighth section of the act of 1859.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. Be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," approved June 30, 1834, as provides that the United States shall make indemnification out of the Treasury for property taken or destroyed in certain cases by the Indians trespassing on white men, as described in the said act, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair or destroy the obligation of the Indians to make indemnification out of the annuities, as prescribed in said act.

Mr. LOWE. Mr. Chairman, while it is true that section 8 of the act of 1859 does withdraw the guarantee for payment of indemnification for these depredations out of the Treasury of the United States, what I have to say in that regard is that it does not necessarily and ought not practically to change the policy of the Government. I have to say further with respect to this section that the provision for the indemnification of citizens of the United States out of the annuities of the Indians, when they are treaty Indians and have funds, is preserved by the proviso to the section just read. I wish to call attention to that proviso again. It is as follows:

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair or destroy the obligation of the Indians to make indemnification out of the annuities, as prescribed in said act.

The act of 1834 is still in force in respect to the indemnification which was guaranteed out of the annuities of the Indians.

Now, let me call attention to one feature which is involved in this matter. Will the Government of the United States discriminate in respect to the indemnity due to these citizens between those depredations committed by annuity Indians and depredations committed by non-annuity Indians?

Can any one refer to any principle of public policy or of private right which would justify such a discrimination? From what source is it that these annuities are derived out of which the indemnity for depredations committed by the annuity Indians shall be paid? Is not every dollar of it derived from the Treasury of the United States? Is not every dollar of the annuities which we pay, and which by treaty we are bound to pay to the Indians, derived from the Treasury of the United States? Is it not, therefore, true that in the end this indemnification is paid out of the Treasury of the United States?

Now, sir, I desire to refer to the act of 1872, for the purpose of showing to this committee that Congress has not heretofore adopted the policy of refusing to pay for Indian depredations, and that if it is adopted to-day, it will be adopted for the first time. I ask the Clerk to read section 7 of the act of 1872.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to prepare and cause to be published such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary or proper, prescribing the manner of presenting claims arising under existing laws or treaty stipulations for compensation for depredations committed by the Indians, and the degree and character of the evidence necessary to support such claims; he shall carefully investigate all such claims as may be presented, subject to the rules and regulations prepared by him, and report to Congress, at each session thereof, the nature, character, and amount of such claims, whether allowed by him or not, and the evidence upon which his action was based: Provided, That no payment on account of said claim shall be made without a specific appropriation therefor by Congress.

Mr. LOWE. Now, Mr. Chairman, so far from the statute law of the United States being against the payment of these claims, it is all the other way. For what purpose was that act of 1872 adopted? Was it for the purpose of showing that these claims shall not be paid? On the contrary, there is a direct mode provided in that act by which these claims shall be proven, by which they shall be established, by which the losses shall be ascertained, and the matter referred to Congress for the purpose of making an appropriation to pay and satisfy them.

Now, sir, I wish to refer very briefly to some of the objections which have been made here to this and kindred measures. In the first place, we are told that this claim like others is thirteen years old. I was pleased with the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS,] and I hope with him that this Government will never adopt the policy of first badgering off just claims from year to year and then pleading the statute of limitation in their own defense. Sir, we all know with what difficulty every private claim is prosecuted either in this Congress or before the Departments.

Every one who has had anything to do with even the most just and proper claims that come before Congress or go before the Departments for allowance, must be aware that it seems to every claimant that the effort of the Department and the effort of Congress is to find some way not to do it, rather than find out the justice of the case and to carry that justice into legislation. Lapse of time can never be pleaded against the Government, and I know of no reason why it should be pleaded in its favor.

It is said that if we allow this claim, many other claims of a similar character will come in and make large draughts on the Treasury. I never heard it pleaded in a court of justice, as a defense in an action of assumpsit or an action of trespass, that the defendant was unable to respond in damages to an execution that might be issued upon a judgment. And I suppose that the people of this country would scarcely regard it as a just ground upon which to refuse the payment of a just claim that it would take some money out of the Treasury.

We have spent $3,000,000,000 in behalf of justice and the integrity of the Government; and while we are meeting the expenses of the Government in every other regard upon principles of justice, I regret to hear it urged in this Hall that a just claim shall not be paid because it may take money from the Treasury. The interests involved in this particular case are not of minor importance. Although this particular bill involves the welfare and the rights of but a single individual, I say to gentlemen on this floor that we cannot afford to ignore the just rights of the citizens of this country.

It is said that there is no legal liability in this case. Sir, shall we find a great wrong existing in this country in respect to thousands of individuals for which no remedy shall be provided by law? Tell me where the remedy is to be found if this application is denied? No man can sue an Indian in a court of justice. Indians are not subject to the jurisdiction of our courts; they are not within their jurisdiction nor within their reach. They have no national organization to which you can appeal through the executive branch of your Government for that justice for which you would appeal to a foreign nation whose subjects had committed depredations upon our citizens. Therefore if you deny them this right, if you deny them this relief, if you deny them this indemnity, then you may have your citizens plundered as they will be and as they have been, day after day, year after year, without the semblance of relief, without the semblance of an opportunity to claim in any form that relief, that protection, for the guarantee and security of which all governments are organized. I hope this bill will pass.

Mr. THORNBURGH obtained the floor.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I want to say a single word in explanation of what I have said.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I cannot yield at present. It is admitted, and I believe correctly, that this bill, let it take any course it may, will settle few if any questions of importance. We have already spent ten times the amount of this claim in discussing it. I move that the committee now rise and report this bill to the House.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Is that motion in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It cannot be submitted to a vote while any member desires to move an amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I desire to move an amendment to the bill.

Mr. AVERILL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few words.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I will do so.

Mr. AVERILL. I will detain the committee but a minute or two. My only excuse for occupying any of the time of the committee at this late hour and after so much discussion is the fact that the drift of debate has seemed to my mind to create a wrong impression.

When this bill was presented to the Committee on Indian Affairs by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COMINGO] it was regarded at first as simply an Indian claim. At that time it was not the purpose of the committee to take any action or to pass upon any bill which would in any manner be a test question upon the subject of Indian depredations. Of course when the bill was presented its merits would have to be first discussed and examined, and they were presented fully by the gentleman from Missouri. Those merits having been fully considered, the next question for the committee was to determine whether or not it was proper to present the case to the House. That they determined to do upon this ground: that this claim having been decided and adjudicated by the Court of Claims, the committee did not feel that they had a right to refuse to concur in the action of the Court of Claims.

There is a twofold reason why the committee felt it to be their duty to instruct the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COMINGO] to report this bill favorably to the House. First, its merits, which were favorably presented; there was no question on that point at all. Second, the case had been fully and fairly considered and adjudicated by the Court of Claims, which held that it was right, just, and proper.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, when I first objected to this bill I supposed it was a naked claim for Indian depredations, like thousands of other claims that come to Congress. Since the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. AVERILL] I am satisfied that it was not regarded by the committee, and I believe it is not now regarded by the House, as the proper subject of a test question. Therefore I do not desire to make it such.

In answer, however, to the suggestion which has been made, that it is a small claim, I wish to say that in my judgment it is a matter of no consequence whether the amount is $250 or $250,000, when we know that there are millions of such claims behind it; and if it was properly a test case I should insist upon my objection, however clamorous any gentleman might be that the bill should be passed. I am sure every gentleman in this House will admit that the Indian question is a subject of importance, worthy to be discussed, and that it is a matter of importance whether we shall establish the precedent that the Government is liable for all claims of this class. But after the discussion which has taken place, and particularly after the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs that this is not regarded as a test case, but merely as one which the Court of Claims, having jurisdiction under the law, has declared to be well founded not only in fact but in law, I do not wish further to antagonize the bill, believing it does not present a test question.

Mr. SPEER. I wish to say but a word. Opposed as I am on principle to legislation of this class, I have listened with attention to this discussion; and I find that the question now presents itself in this form: the Court of Claims, having taken legal jurisdiction of this case, has rendered a judgment, but has no power to enforce its collection. This bill proposes merely an appropriation to pay the judgment of a court rendered upon a question of which it had competent legal jurisdiction. No lawyer, it seems to me, and no other fair-minded man, can satisfy his conscience in opposing such a bill.

Mr. SHANKS. I believe there is no opposition to this bill on its merits. This discussion, I presume, has grown out of the desire to argue this question of Indian claims. The Committee on Indian Affairs passed upon this proposition favorably because it was to pay for damages committed prior to February, 1859; and as to the liability in such cases there is, I believe, no division in the committee. I presume the case received the favorable action of the Court of Claims for the same reason. As a claim for damages committed prior to February, 1859, the court had a perfect right to pass upon it. Taking the case in this view, there is no antagonism in regard to it in the committee, and none, I presume, in the House. But if the claim had accrued since February, 1859, it would no doubt encounter antagonism. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES PRESTON BECK.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1925) for the relief of James Preston Beck, administrator of Preston Beck, jr., deceased, authorizing payment for Indian depredations.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to James Preston Beck, as administrator of Preston Beck, jr., deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $6,565, being the amount of bill No. 109, report No. 282, reported by the Court of Claims to the Thirty-seventh Congress, second session.

Mr. AVERILL. This is a bill of precisely the same character as the last, and involving the same principle.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Has the case been passed upon by the Court of Claims?

Mr. AVERILL. It is, I repeat, in precisely the same position as the other case. It is not intended to commit the House in any way upon the general question as to the obligation of the Government to pay for Indian depredations. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

SILOMA DECK.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 980) for the relief of Siloma Deck.

Mr. AVERILL. As a bill similar to this has already been passed by both Houses, I move that this bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

SOUTHERN WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move that the bills on the Private Calendar be severally laid aside as reached until we come to the bill (H. R. No. 2797) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of March 3, 1871.

Several MEMBERS. O, no.

Mr. LAWRENCE. O, yes. It is exceedingly important that we should reach that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It requires unanimous consent.

Several members objected.

RESTORATION OF ARMY OFFICERS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1051) for the restoration to their several positions in the Army of Captain J. Horace McGuire, First Lieutenant Henry R. Gardner, Second Lieutenant William D. McGuire, and Second Lieutenant William C. Reddy, all late of the Tenth Regiment United States Colored Artillery, (Heavy,) and directing their honorable muster out of the service of the United States as of the date of the muster out of the said regiment.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. As a substitute for this bill I move what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill for the honorable discharge from their several positions in the Army of Captain J. Horace McGuire, First Lieutenant Henry R. Gardner, Second Lieutenant William D. McGuire, and Second Lieutenant William C. Reddy, all late of the Tenth Regiment United States Colored Artillery, (Heavy,) and directing their honorable muster out of the service of the United States as of the date of the muster out of the said regiment, as of the date of their dismissal.

Whereas the said Captain J. Horace McGuire, Tenth Regiment United States Colored Artillery, (Heavy,) was, on the 8th day of September, 1866, dismissed the service of the United States by virtue of General Order No. 4, headquarters Department of the Gulf, September 8, 1866, pursuant to the sentence of a general court-martial; and whereas the said First Lieutenant Henry R. Gardner, said Second Lieutenant William D. McGuire, and said Second Lieutenant William C. Reddy, of the same regiment, were, on the 13th day of September, 1866, severally dismissed the service of the United States by virtue of General Order No. 5, headquarters Department of the Gulf, September 13, 1866, pursuant to the sentence of a general court-martial, which said several general orders and sentences were approved by General Court-martial Order No. 210, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, November 16, 1866; and whereas the said several sentences, although within the letter of the law and Articles of War, and founded upon proceedings regularly conducted, were, nevertheless, manifestly disproportionate to the offense charged, and therefore unjust, and have worked great and unnecessary injury to the reputations of the said J. Horace McGuire, Henry R. Gardner, William D. McGuire, and William C. Reddy: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be directed to cause the said Captain J. Horace McGuire, First Lieutenant Henry R. Gardner, Second Lieutenant William D. McGuire, and Second Lieutenant William C. Reddy to be honorably discharged from the several positions from which they were dismissed as aforesaid.

The substitute was agreed to; and the bill, as thus amended, was laid aside, to be favorably reported to the House.

FREDERICK F. BAURY.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1941) to provide for the appointment of Frederick F. Baury on the retired list of the Navy.

The bill was read.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise for the purpose of suggesting that we informally lay this bill aside for the present. The Committee on Naval Affairs is, I believe, every one of them absent to-day; and as that committee is divided on this case it seems proper we should pass it over for the present in order that it may be acted on when the members of the committee are in the House.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I hope that will be passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs are absent by leave of the House, and if there be no objection the bill will be passed over.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SPEER. I should like to ask the Chair what will be the effect of passing over this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It will retain its place on the Calendar, and will come up as the first bill the next time the Private Calendar is taken up.

NANCY C. MARLETTE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1952) granting a pension to Nancy C. Marlette.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nancy C. Marlette, widow of John C. Marlette, late of Company E, Sixty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and pay her arrears of pension from the time of the death of her husband to the time of the commencement of her present pension.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

John C. Marlette, the husband of Nancy Marlette, enlisted on the 31st of October, 1862, for three years, in Company E, Sixty-sixth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and afterward, to wit, on the 8th day of January, 1863, he died in the hospital at Indianapolis. Within a short time after his death, Nancy Marlette, his widow, through her attorney, Arthur J. Simpson, made out and prepared all the necessary papers, with proof of enlistment; proof that her husband was sworn into the United States service; proof of her marriage to him; proof of the birth of their six children, with respective age of each, and the proof of his death, to secure a pension for herself and children, and forwarded the same to D. C. Donahoe, a claim agent at Washington City. Mr. Donahoe afterward concluded to leave Washington, and wrote that he had turned over his professional business to one Lockhart, who afterward wrote to Mr. Simpson that he had turned over all his business to one Mr. Crall. The application of Mrs. Marlette and all accompanying proofs were lost after they were mailed in Indiana by Mr. Simpson. It is not known or proven how, when, or where they were lost, whether in the mail, at some of the offices of the above-named agents, or at the Pension Office in this city. Nancy Marlette was not informed of their safe arrival at Washington City, and was not advised of their loss until the 8th of May, 1868. As soon as she ascertained their loss, she had duplicate papers made out and filed in the Pension Office at Washington City for a pension. A pension of eight dollars per month was allowed her from the 8th day of May, 1868, she receiving the certificate of pension on the 7th of September, 1868.

Nancy Marlette asks that a pension of eight dollars per month be granted her from the 8th day of January, 1863, the day of the death of her husband, to the 8th day of May, 1868, when she commenced receiving one under the duplicate papers which she filed in the Pension Office. The committee recommend its allowance for the following reasons:

First. From the fact that she and the children, the issue of the marriage, are now receiving pensions. It is admitted that she is the widow and they are the children of John C. Marlette; that he was a soldier in the United States service; and that he died while a soldier in the line of his duty, or from a disease contracted after he became a soldier.

Second. It is clearly proven by the affidavit of Arthur J. Simpson, subscribed and sworn to on the 3d day of January, 1870, before John S. Megerrity, clerk of the circuit court of Orange County, Indiana, that he made out the original application of Nancy Marlette for a pension in the summer of 1863, with all the necessary proofs, and forwarded them by mail to D. C. Donahoe, claim agent, at Washington City.

Third. It is clearly proven by the affidavit of said circuit clerk, subscribed and sworn to before A. J. Simpson, notary public within and for Orange County, Indiana, on the 8th day of January, 1870, that such application of Nancy Marlette for a pension was made out and subscribed to before him as such circuit clerk, by Nancy Marlette, some four or five years prior to his affidavit, which affidavits are hereto attached.

Fourth. It is no fault of Nancy Marlette that her pension did not commence on the 8th day of January, 1863; she did all a poor woman could do to secure that pittance offered by the Government. Her ignorance should not be held as an argument against the justice of her claim. It is undoubtedly true that she had done all that was within her power, and if by the carelessness of her agents and the indifference of her attorneys she was made to suffer, then the Government should not be a party now to take advantage of the inefficiency of such agents or attorneys; and we therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN HENDERSON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1955) for the relief of John Henderson, of New Orleans.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to refund and pay to John Henderson, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, in full satisfaction of the amount paid by said Henderson upon a bond for the release of one hundred barrels of spirits given by him as claimant under the order of the United States district court for the eastern district of Missouri, and upon which spirits the said Henderson in good faith had paid the taxes assessed by the United States officers.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I ask that the report in that case be read.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The petitioner, John Henderson, of New Orleans, in the latter part of July, A. D. 1868, at said city, through his broker, Thaddeus Waterman, purchased of J. R. Irwin one hundred barrels of whisky, then in a United States bonded warehouse in New Orleans, the same having been placed therein until the taxes thereon should be paid. Henderson paid said Irwin for said whisky the sum of $1,000, cash, subject to the tax due the United States, and immediately thereafter he paid the internal-revenue collector, S. A. Stockdale, for taxes due on said whisky, the sum of $2,384.50; and thereupon said collector released said whisky to Henderson, which was taken from bonded warehouse by Henderson, and, in the ordinary course of trade, he consigned the same to the city of Saint Louis for sale. It appears that Henderson was, and had been for a long time, a large dealer in wines and liquors, and has the reputation of being an honorable dealer, and has complied with the laws faithfully and without giving trouble to the revenue officers.

On the 1st day of September, 1868, after the whisky reached Saint Louis, the United States district attorney for the district of Missouri libeled and seized said whisky, on the ground that the same was manufactured at some place within the United States to said attorney unknown, and between the 1st day of September, 1866, and the date of said seizure, by some person and persons to said attorney also unknown, and were then and there goods and commodities on which a tax was then and there imposed by the provisions of law; and the same were removed from the place where distilled with intent to defraud the United States of such tax, the same being then and there unpaid, contrary to the form of the statutes of the said United States in such case made and provided. Henderson appeared in said suit, made claim to the whisky, and the same was delivered to him by order of the court, on his giving bond in the sum of $5,000. He also answered in the case, denying the allegations in the libel. The case was tried on an agreed statement of the facts, which contained an admission that the allegations herein recited were true; but also it was agreed that Henderson purchased the spirits in the bonded warehouse, paid the taxes thereon, and that he was an innocent and bona fide purchaser; and on this single issue the case was tried, and resulted in a judgment for the claimant, Henderson, in the district court of Missouri, which was affirmed by the circuit court held in the same district. The case was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States by the Government, and the latter court reversed the judgments of both lower courts, and condemned the spirits. Judgment was rendered against Henderson and sureties on the bond of release, which judgment was paid by Henderson, and amounts to $5,000, exclusive of costs.

It is admitted by the Government that Henderson, at the time of purchase, and subsequently, had no knowledge of anything wrong about the spirits, and purchased the same in good faith and for its fair market value; and that the fact that Henderson was an innocent purchaser is also shown by the affidavit of himself and that of Waterman, his broker, who made the purchase for Henderson.

The Supreme Court, by a majority opinion, declared the law to be that any intent to commit a fraud against the revenue laws at once forfeited the spirits to the United States, and that an innocent and bona fide purchase could not acquire title thereto, although the purchase was made while the goods were in Government custody, and the dues demanded by the Government were paid by the purchaser.

If the law is as held by the Supreme Court, the taxes were paid by Henderson under a mistake of fact as to the owner of the spirits, a mistake which the Government led him into, and which the Government was laboring under at the time. The Government could not be entitled to the spirits and the tax thereon at the same time. Such could not have been the intention of Congress. It is the intent of the Government to encourage trade and commerce, and not to discourage. The rule of the Supreme Court would deter all men from dealing in spirits, for fear of being caught. The decision of the Supreme Court was made in 1872. For six years the law has been so uncertain and subtile that only a Supreme Court or a majority of it could, after much labor, determine what it was. Henderson purchased the spirits, expecting to pay the tax, which he did do, and it is fair that the Government should have the tax and Henderson the spirits. In lieu of the spirits the Government has $5,000, which should be refunded to Henderson, or if the spirits were the property of the Government the tax paid should be refunded to Henderson. It will be observed that in point of fact the spirits were never removed before the purchase by Henderson, except to a United States bonded warehouse, which was a measure to secure the tax; and as Henderson paid it, and received the spirits from the Government, it should be satisfied to retain that for which the law was made, and the $5,000 should be paid back to Henderson. The committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. It seems to me that the appropriation in this bill should be only the amount of taxes paid by Mr. Henderson. It is obvious that the amount of taxes paid on these spirits should be refunded to him. As I understand the case it is this: Mr. Henderson purchased in good faith one hundred barrels of whisky without knowing there was anything wrong in it. He purchased these one hundred barrels of whisky paying for them the sum of $1,000 in cash, subject to the tax due to the United States. The whisky was in a bonded warehouse in New Orleans. In order to get it out of that bonded warehouse he paid the Government tax of $2,384.50 on it. Afterward, and after the whisky was shipped to Saint Louis, the United States district attorney for the district of Missouri libeled and seized the whisky upon the ground that it was manufactured at some place within the United States to him unknown and was removed with intent to defraud the Government of the tax due. The suit growing out of that libel was prosecuted to the end in the Supeme Court, and the Supreme Court held that the whisky was liable to condemnation. After the seizure Mr. Henderson gave his bond for $5,000, which was the estimated value of the whisky, and the whisky was delivered to him. And upon this final judgment was had upon this bond, and he paid the $5,000, being the penalty fixed in the bond.

Now, I do not see how the United States have been in fault in the matter in the least degree. They certainly were not to blame because this whisky was liable to be libeled and seized, being liable to be seized and condemned by reason of facts which attached to the whisky and not then known to the Government of the United States. The fact that Henderson lost the whisky is not the fault of the United States, and they should not indemnify him for the loss.

But it does seem to me reasonable under the circumstances that the Government should refund to him the tax they had collected on the whisky, and it seems to me that the bill should be made to cover the amount of the tax and not the value of the whisky.

Mr. BURCHARD. Has the gentleman noticed the fact that the alleged intention to defraud was held to consist in transferring the whisky from the point where it was manufactured to a bonded warehouse? In taking it from the distillery and putting it under the charge of a Government officer, in a Government warehouse, the allegation was that there was an intention to defraud the United States, it being there in the charge of the Government and the taxes unpaid. The purchaser, Mr. Henderson, bought the distilled spirits, paid the owner the value of it, and paid the Government the taxes that were liable to be paid on its being taken out of bond. It is in the possession of the Government——

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Not when the fraud was committed.

Mr. BURCHARD. It was in the possession of the Government at the time the purchase was made. Was it the intention of the original owner to defraud the Government in putting it into the charge of the Government? We all know that the Supreme Court on that question were divided, and a majority of them decided that the whisky was forfeited to the United States; three of the judges, giving very able dissenting opinions, held it was not. We do not pass upon the question of law; the Committee on Ways and Means have accepted the decision of the majority of the Supreme Court on that question. But on the equities of the case, on all the facts as set forth in the report, it seemed to the committee just that the Government should take this tax, should accept that, and should not ask of this party the penalty of the bond. As to the tax having been subsequently paid the evidence is clear.

Mr. BECK. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] to yield to me for two minutes.

Mr. BURCHARD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BECK. I want to say a word about this matter, having had occasion to examine it in the committee. It seems to me that there is no sort of pretense why we should not pay back this money to Henderson. He bought the whisky in the bonded warehouse while it was in the custody of the United States, paid his money for it, paid the Government all the taxes that were due upon the whisky, and removed it to Saint Louis. After it was taken there a claim was set up that the man who originally owned the whisky had removed it to the distillery warehouse for the purpose of defrauding the Government, and certainly it would seem a very strange claim that whisky should be put into a distillery warehouse for the purpose of defrauding the Government. It is admitted that Henderson knew nothing about any fraud, but in good faith paid the taxes to the United States, and took it at the warehouse built by the Government, where it was under the care of officers of the Government. The counsel in making up the pleadings agreed as to all the facts, and among other things unfortunately agreed to the truth of the allegation that the whisky had been removed from the place where distilled to this warehouse with the intent to defraud the Government by some one. The case was tried in the district court, and there was a decision in favor of Henderson. It was carried to the circuit court, and was decided in favor of Henderson. It was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, and there it was decided by a majority of the court that the admission that somebody at some time had done something with intent to defraud brought the case within the technical meaning of the law, and forfeiture followed because fraud existed somewhere. Judge Field delivered a dissenting opinion, which the Chief Justice and Justice Dillon concurred in, and, with all due respect to the majority of the court, I think his statement of the case is correct.

Justice Field said:

> We thus have this singular, and I venture to say unprecedented, fact in the history of judicial decisions in this country, that the property of a citizen honestly acquired, without suspicion or wrong in his vendor, is forfeited and taken from him because such vendor, at some period while owning the property, conceived the intent to defraud the Government of the tax thereon, although such intent was never developed in action, and for the execution of which no step was ever taken.
> The presumption is that the majority of the court are right in this decision, and that the minority are mistaken in their views of the law governing the case. It is therefore with diffidence that I venture to dissent from their judgment, a diffidence which is greatly augmented by the declaration of the majority that it is impossible to escape the conclusion which they have reached.

Then he goes on and shows that that decision—and I say it with proper respect for the court—is the most foolish decision that can be found in all their books. The opinion of the minority is overwhelming and conclusive. No act was done by anybody.

An intent to defraud was admitted in an agreed case somewhere, at some time, and that was held by a majority of the court to deprive this man of the right to the property which he had bought while it was under the control of the Government in a Government warehouse, and for which he had paid. And upon that judgment he was made to pay $5,000. I think the Congress of the United States ought unanimously to give it back to him, as it was wrongfully taken from him.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. The gentleman from Kentucky has put this case just where I supposed it would have to be put to defend the report of the Committee on Ways and Means, and that is, on the ground that the decision of the Supreme Court was a wrong one. In other words, it is an attempt by congressional action to overrule the decision and finding of the Supreme Court. Now, I confess that that is to me a somewhat novel and startling proposition. Here is a case which has been through all the courts. The party has had all the hearing that he could have had from the lowest to the highest tribunal, and he was finally beaten by a judgment of the Supreme Court. The gentleman from Kentucky now says that the argument of the minority of the court has all the weight, and that the argument and the decision of the majority ought to go for nothing here; and inasmuch as this man has been beaten in the court by a judgment for which the gentleman has no respect, and which was founded upon reasons which are not conclusive to him, he is in favor of paying back to this man the $5,000.

Now, sir, if the decisions of the Supreme Court are to be brought in here in all these cases where the customs laws have been violated, or the revenue laws have been violated, and property seized under those laws has been confiscated—and they may as well be brought in one case as in another—and the parties are to have the right of appeal here and of having a review of the law and the facts, what is the use of having courts at all? What is the use of having tribunals to settle these questions at all? Why not abolish the district courts and the Supreme Court, and provide that every party who is supposed to be guilty of a violation of these laws in respect to internal revenue or customs may come before Congress and have his hearing? That is the substance and force of the argument made here by the gentleman from Kentucky in favor of this bill.

Now, sir, this party is not entitled in equity, is not entitled under any decision of the courts or under any practice of Congress that I know of, to have this money paid back to him or to have even the tax paid back to him. If the tax is paid back to him, it will be a matter of favor; and why should we go beyond that? I know that it is a pretty hard thing to say a word against the finding of a committee so important as is the Committee on Ways and Means in this House, and that their judgment will probably be conclusive in this matter. I do not suppose that anything I may say will prevent the House from passing this bill; but I do say that it seems to me to be a precedent entirely in the wrong direction for us, when a party has had a hearing in court and has paid under the judgment of the court $5,000, to pay the money back to him in the way of a review of the action of the court in his case.

Mr. BURCHARD. Mr. Chairman, the fact that this purchaser was a bona fide purchaser makes this case to my mind different from what it would be if he were the original party who had been guilty of the fraud. That would be a case where we should not grant relief from the penalty; but the proof in this case is clear; it was admitted in the pleadings and admitted in the court that he was an innocent purchaser of property under the control of the Government; and I think the equities are in his favor, and that he should recover not the tax merely but the property itself, which was sold to him while it was under the control of the Government and when he had every reason to believe that it could be legally sold.

I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I am familiar with the facts in this very remarkable case. I was of counsel in this case for Mr. Henderson in his appeal to the Supreme Court, and I refer to it now only to show the injustice which the letter of the law sometimes inflicts upon a citizen. I may say that it appeared to be conceded on all hands, both by counsel and by the court, that the result worked a great hardship to Mr. Henderson. I may say, also, that the decree of the court was a surprise to counsel on both sides. I will briefly refer to the questions involved in the opinion of the court.

There was just this point on which the case turned. The case came up to the Supreme Court on an agreed statement of facts, and by the blundering of the attorneys in the court below that statement set forth that the spirits were removed to a bonded warehouse of the United States by the distiller with intent to defraud the revenue. Thus Henderson, the innocent purchaser, was left in the singular attitude of confessing that the distiller had removed this liquor to a place where it was lawful for him to place it, where it was his duty to remove it, where the statute required him to deposit it; and that he had done this lawful act with intent to defraud the United States! That statement as to the distiller's intention was so absurd on the face of it, that we never dreamed that anybody would regard it as anything more than surplusage or a mere blunder on the part of the lawyers in the court below; and yet that admission, I have no doubt, was the point on which the decision turned.

And in the same agreed statement of facts it was also admitted that John Henderson was perfectly innocent either of any fraud upon the revenue or of any intention to defraud, or of any knowledge that anybody else had any intention to defraud. The alleged fraud upon the revenue was committed by the original distiller of the spirits long before John Henderson knew anything about them. When Henderson came to buy the spirits he found them in a United States bonded warehouse, where the law required them to be. He went there and paid the tax in full, and took from the revenue officer in charge a Government receipt that the tax had been paid in full. And only then, with the Government receipt in his hand for the full payment of all the dues upon the spirits, did he proceed to make the purchase.

He made the purchase and took the spirits to Saint Louis. After he had landed them there, and when he was about to consign them to the person to whom he was to sell them, an internal-revenue detective officer came along and said: "We find that away back of the time when you knew anything about these spirits the man who kept the distillery neglected to make certain entries in his book, such as under the law he ought to have made, touching the number of pounds and gallons of materials he day by day used in his distillery; and thereby he violated the language of the internal-revenue law, and the liquor he made during those days became forfeited, and the forfeiture worked upon the spirits, so that they became eo instanti the property of the United States, and therefore wherever afterward found the Government could take them.

To that it was responded that all the United States ever made these laws forwas to get the tax. The Government has had the tax in full, and has given a receipt for the tax in full. The tax is in the Treasury, paid regularly, and we have receipted for it. But the officer said, We have determined that the liquor is forfeited, and we will seize it. They did seize it, and went on and sold it, and paid over the proceeds into the Treasury of the United States; so that at the present moment the Government has not only the full amount of the tax, but all the proceeds of the liquor which was condemned, seized, and sold. The Government has the proceeds of the property and the tax besides. The Government has received the tax, and now it says there was an intent to defraud the Government of the tax, which it has already received.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Does this bill propose to refund the amount of the tax merely?

Mr. GARFIELD. It proposes to refund the money which was received for the property which was seized and sold.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Has the United States Government ever received it?

Mr. GARFIELD. The whole amount of the proceeds was paid over to the Government, which now has it.

Mr. SHELDON. There was a judgment rendered for $5,000, which was paid.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the Clerk to read a paragraph which I have marked, from the dissenting opinion of Judge Field, which dissenting opinion was concurred in by the Chief Justice. That will explain the nature of the equity of the case. If my friend from Vermont [Mr. WILLARD] will listen to it, he will see that we are not now revising the decision of the Supreme Court at all, but that the Court clearly intimated that whatever relief Henderson got must be obtained from Congress, not from the court. And he comes here as a court of last resort for his relief.

The Clerk read as follows:

This is a case of great hardship and manifest injustice. The claimant found the spirits in a bonded warehouse of the Government, in custody of the officers of the United States. He paid to them the tax due on the goods, and he paid to the owner their value. He had no suspicions that his vendor ever entertained any intention to defraud the Government of the tax levied on them, and if he ever had such suspicions he might well have supposed that his vendor had repented of his intentions when he delivered the property to the keeping of the officers of the United States. The Government through its officers took from the innocent purchaser the duties on the goods, thus saying to him that the goods then belonged to the distiller who placed them in the warehouse. The Government now declares through its officers that those goods all the time belonged to it by reason of the previous forfeiture, and that the honest claimant loses both the tax and the goods, or at least is left to the doubtful chances of obtaining the former by petition to the Government, and the latter by action against the vendor.

Mr. BURCHARD. I move that this bill be laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I desire to inquire if the Committee on Ways and Means are united on this report?

Mr. BURCHARD. It is a unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. KELLEY. Unquestionably so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] moves that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Before that question is submitted to the committee, I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the word "appropriation," and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

The sum of $2,384.50, that being the amount paid by said Henderson on one hundred barrels of spirits afterward libeled and seized by the United States Government and condemned by the final decision of the Supreme Court.

I appreciate, of course, the desire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to have this case reheard here upon an appeal, as he says, to this highest court, and to have this money which has been forfeited to the Government returned. But still I cannot see that the gentleman has made it plain that we ought to pass this bill, unless we concede that this is a tribunal which can reverse and ought to reverse the decision of the Supreme Court. That is just the proposition presented here. This man Henderson has had his day in court; he has had every opportunity to be heard; able counsel have presented his case at all stages and in every aspect. He now takes an appeal from the finding of the highest judicial tribunal in the land to the Congress of the United States, in order to have paid back to him the money which he has forfeited in accordance with law.

Mr. GARFIELD. I by no means contended that this proceeding was a proposed reversal of the decision of the court. I maintained merely the propriety and justice of relieving this gentleman from the hardship of a case in which the equities of his position could not be presented.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understood the gentleman to say that this was in the nature of an appeal to Congress as a higher tribunal.

Mr. GARFIELD, O, no.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. This man has no equities in this case any more than any other man who gets beaten in a lawsuit. Congress may, if it chooses, hear every party who is convicted upon trial in the courts, or whose property is condemned when seized on legal process. It may allow all such parties to come here by appeal and say that the decision in their case is inequitable, that they have been deprived unjustly of rights of person or property.

The Committee on Ways and Means in this instance report a bill asking that the judgment of a court shall be practically reversed, and that the money paid into the Treasury of the United States in pursuance of that judgment shall be returned. Yet they do not propose to repeal the law under which that finding was made; they do not ask to set aside the general statute; they simply propose to reverse the decision of the court. That is the effect of this legislation. If this decision is in accordance with the statute, and the statute is wrong, why did not the gentleman bring in a bill to repeal or modify the statute?

Mr. GARFIELD. It has since been repealed.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understood a gentleman of the committee to say that it had not been. Now, sir, I cannot see that this claim has any equities at all in its favor, unless it is the equitable right of this man to have refunded to him the tax which the Government has collected. If he has any equity, it goes merely to that extent.

Mr. BURCHARD. Suppose this were a transaction between private parties. Suppose that distilled spirits were in possession of a person claiming a lien upon them, and who allowed them to be sold to a third party, asserting, only his lien; would he not be equitably estopped from asserting his ownership afterward?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. That is not this case at all. The Government is in no fault in this matter. From first to last it has never been shown that the officers of the Government had any knowledge of this fraud until after the spirits were taken out of the bonded warehouse upon speculation by this man Henderson. As a matter of favor to the manufacturers they are allowed to deposit their spirits in bonded warehouses; but if the Government is to be regarded as a guarantor that all the spirits deposited in bonded warehouses came there honestly, then I think it is time we should abolish bonded warehouses.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Would not Henderson have a distinct remedy by action against Irwin?

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] suggests, the liquor being sold by a person who had knowledge of, and, indeed, had perpetrated the fraud which tainted these spirits, the purchaser has his remedy against the seller. The familiar principle of law that the purchaser should beware applies in this case. The Government of the United States has no connection with this matter at all.

Mr. GARFIELD. It received the money twice over; that is all.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, it was not agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside, to be favorably reported to the House.

STEAMER CLARA DOLSEN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2101) for the relief of the owners of the steamer Clara Dolsen.

Mr. COTTON. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TYNER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had directed him to report to the House sundry bills.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 149) for the relief of certain settlers on the Fort Randall military reservation;

An act (S. No. 347) granting a portion of the United States military reservation at Salt Lake City for cemetery purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 3028) giving the assent of Congress for the improvement of the Wolf River, across the Menomonee Indian reservation, in the State of Wisconsin; and

An act (H. R. No. 3161) to enable the Secretary of War to carry out the act of April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Mississippi River," and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CURTIS for ten days from the 9th of May; to Mr. STORM for one week; to Mr. SLOSS for eight days; to Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, for one week; to Mr. KELLEY indefinitely on account of sickness; to Mr. BANNING for ten days on account of sickness in his family, and to Mr. WARD, of Illinois, for one week.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted Mr. COBURN to print some remarks on the centennial; and to Mr. HEREFORD to print some remarks on the subject of paying for colleges and churches and other similar property destroyed during the war. (See Appendix.)

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar favorably, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1775) for the relief of Foster A. Hixson, late a paymaster in the United States Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 1924) for the relief of James L. Johnson, surviving partner of Beck & Johnson, authorizing payment for Indian depredations;

A bill (H. R. No. 1925) for the relief of James Preston Beck, administrator of Preston Beck, jr., deceased, authorizing payment for Indian depredations;

A bill (H. R. No. 1051) for the restoration to their several positions in the Army of Captain Horace McGuire, First Lieutenant Henry D. Gardner, Second Lieutenant William D. McGuire, and Second Lieutenant William C. Reddy;

A bill (H. R. No. 1952) granting a pension to Nancy C. Marlette; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1955) for the relief of John Henderson, of New Orleans.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that I have abstained from voting on the bill for the relief of John Henderson, not that I was interested in it at all, but because I was counsel in the case when it was pending before the Supreme Court.

Mr. RANDALL. Did you not make a speech in favor of it in committee?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly I did; I merely stated the facts of the case for the information of the House.

SILOMA DECK.

The bill (H. R. No. 980) for the relief of Siloma Deck was laid on the table, agreeably to the report of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, a similar bill having been passed already.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. A session of the House has been ordered for this evening for debate only as in Committee of the Whole on the President's annual message, no business whatever to be transacted; and the gentleman from New York, Mr. MACDOUGALL, will occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

And then, on motion of Mr. COTTON, (at five o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until seven and a half o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. MACDOUGALL in the chair.) The House meets to-night as in Committee of the Whole for debate only on the President's annual message, no business whatever to be transacted.

CURRENCY.

Mr. COMINGO. Mr. Speaker, the veto of the Senate bill relating to the currency of the country has reopened the field for the discussion of that subject, and we have yet to settle the financial policy by which we are to be governed.

The provisions of that bill, as well as those of the bill that originated in the House, failed, in my opinion, to meet the wants of the people. Hence, the day previous to their passage in the House, I introduced the following, which I thought better suited to the exigencies of the times. I incorporate it as a part of my remarks on this occasion:

A bill providing for the retiring of the national-bank currency by the substitution of Treasury notes therefor, and for the issuing of convertible bonds, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act no national bank shall be organized under any act or acts of Congress authorizing their organization, nor shall the circulation of any national bank be hereafter in any manner increased.

SEC. 2. That on the 30th day of September, 1874, and on the last day of each and every month thereafter, until the whole of its circulation shall have been retired, each and every national bank shall, in the manner hereinafter provided, retire at least 5 per cent. of its circulation; and in the event that any of said banks shall refuse so to do, it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to cause such bank or banks to be proceeded against, and the business thereof wound up as in cases of insolvency.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to issue, on the faith and credit of the Government, $400,000,000 of Treasury notes, payable to bearer, which said notes shall be similar in form and appearance to the said legal-tender notes, and may be of denominations not less than five nor more than five thousand dollars. And said Treasury notes shall be receivable and shall be a legal tender at their face value, in payment for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt of the United States. And said notes, and also all legal-tender notes that have been issued or that may hereafter be issued, shall be a legal tender, and shall be receivable at their face value in payment of one-third of the duties on imports hereafter made.

SEC. 4. That the Treasury notes issued in pursuance of this act may be used in the purchase of United States bonds commonly called five-twenties, and may be given in exchange for national-bank paper that may be retired in pursuance of the provisions of this act, but only as in the next section provided.

SEC. 5. That when any national bank shall return 5 per cent. or more of its circulation, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, the Treasurer of the United States shall return to such bank, in exchange therefor, an equal amount of the Treasury notes issued in pursuance of the provisions of this act, or an equal amount of legal-tender notes, and, in addition, a sum equal to the difference, if any, between the face value of the Treasury or legal-tender notes and the market value of the bonds deposited by such bank with the Treasurer as security for the redemption of its circulation; and the Treasurer shall thereupon destroy, of the bonds deposited by such bank as aforesaid, an amount equal to the amount of its circulation returned; or the Treasurer may, at his option and with the advice and consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, return to such bank an amount of said bonds equal to the amount of its circulation returned in pursuance of this act.

SEC. 6. That the Treasurer shall keep accurate accounts with each of said national banks, showing the amount of its circulation returned, the amount and kind of notes returned in exchange therefor, the difference per cent., if any allowed, between the face value of the notes and the market value of the bonds; and, on the second Monday in each month, the currency and bonds so redeemed shall be destroyed by the Treasurer, in the presence of the Secretary and the Register of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency, each of whom shall keep an accurate account of the numbers and amount of bonds and bank-notes destroyed, and the names of the banks that owned and held the same.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue from time to time, on demand, in exchange at par for said Treasury and legal-tender notes of the United States, the bonds of the United States in denominations of fifty dollars or any multiple thereof; said bonds to be called United States convertible bonds, to bear interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, the principal of which shall be payable on demand in said Treasury and legal-tender notes of the United States, and the interest in gold or silver coin: Provided, however, That interest shall not be paid on any of said bonds of less denominations than $100 for a period that is less than sixty days.

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to redeem said bonds on demand at the Treasury of the United States, at the offices of the assistant treasurers of the United States, and at such other convenient places within the United States as he may designate for that purpose, and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and whenever said bonds are presented and paid as aforesaid, the same shall be immediately canceled and stamped with the word "paid" on the face thereof, and the same shall be forwarded to the Treasurer of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury shall monthly cause the bonds so paid to be destroyed in the presence of the Treasurer of the United States and the Register of the Treasury, of which destruction a record shall be made, showing the date, denomination, number, and date of payment of each bond, in a book to be provided for that purpose, and signed by the officers aforesaid.

SEC. 9. That the $50,000,000 of legal-tender United States notes authorized by existing laws to be issued in addition to the $400,000,000 contemplated for permanent circulation shall be prepared and held as a reserve for the redemption and payment of the Treasury notes authorized to be issued by section 3 and of the convertible bonds authorized to be issued by section 7 of this act.

SEC. 10. That the money received in exchange for convertible bonds shall only be used in the purchase of United States five-twenty bonds, and in keeping a reserve for the payment of the principal and interest of the convertible bonds when demanded; which reserve shall be an amount, in addition to the $50,000,000 mentioned in section 9 of this act, sufficient, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, to insure their prompt redemption. Whenever any portion of said $50,000,000 shall have been used in the redemption of Treasury notes or convertible bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sell to the highest bidder, for United States legal-tender notes, any of the bonds now authorized by law to be issued, for funding the public debt, to an amount sufficient to restore to the Treasury all of said fifty millions that shall have been used as aforesaid. Such sale of bonds shall be made on due notice by advertisement and on biddings made by sealed proposals.

SEC. 11. That whenever the Secretary of the Treasury may deem it advisable, he may use any coin in the Treasury not required for the payment of demands against the United States payable in coin, in redeeming any United States five-twenty bonds that have become payable at the pleasure of the Government; the market value of which said coin, as fixed by said Secretary, shall be substituted by Treasury notes issued by authority of this act, or by legal-tender notes received under authority of this act, which shall thereupon become subject to be used in the payment of all claims and demands against the United States.

SEC. 12. That each national bank may withdraw any part of its United States registered bonds deposited as security for the redemption of its circulation by paying into the proper department of the Treasury $900 of its circulation for each $1,000 of bonds so withdrawn, and may withdraw all of said registered bonds by paying a sum equal to its whole circulation in its own bank-notes and United States legal-tender notes, or wholly in either of them; and thereupon the United States shall be bound to redeem, on demand, the whole of such circulation of said bank which shall be outstanding. When such circulation is redeemed or paid into the Treasury as provided herein, it shall be destroyed in the manner now provided by law.

SEC. 13. That national banks that shall return their circulation in accordance with the provisions of this act, and receive Treasury notes in lieu thereof, shall be permitted to continue business under the authority heretofore granted them; and they shall be exempt from taxation by the Government of the United States, but shall at all times keep on hand of their deposits such proportion thereof as is required by section 31 of the act entitled "An act to provide a national currency, and so forth," approved June 3, 1864.

In connection with this bill I desire, Mr. Speaker, to present some general remarks relative to specie payment, banking, and currency.

The difficulties, Mr. Speaker, that environ the financial affairs of our country are becoming more apparent and complicated every day. No one can read what has been written and spoken on this subject without perceiving the irreconcilable conflict that exists between the views that have been expressed, nor without a feeling of embarrassment, growing out of the inharmonious and incongruous theories that have been presented; nor, indeed, without a feeling of distrust as to the practicability and safety of his own schemes for relief, or those of any one among the many who have labored to instruct the public mind and influence legislation in this behalf. They are most highly favored, indeed, who can examine the subject by these lights, or by any other that have been or can be brought to bear upon it, without encountering the most perplexing difficulties, and realizing a feeling of distrust as to the wisdom or practicability of any of the plans that have been proposed.

No two of the thousands who have written and spoken on this subject exactly agree; while many of them differ so widely that a reconciliation of their conflicting views is impossible.

The causes of these differences are manifestly to be found in the diversity of interests to be affected and the manner in which they will be affected by any legislation that has been or that can be had upon the subject. Nothing can be done that will not displease somebody and call forth severe criticism, if not denunciation. Interest and not principle seems to control; and hence we find that the people differ among themselves and their representatives differ with each other. While these differences exist satisfactory results cannot be secured, but are simply impossible; and the grave and vitally important question, What policy is best calculated to relieve the financial distress of our country? remains to be solved, and the earnest and importunate demand of the indebted, overtaxed, and toiling classes for relief continues to be uttered and heard in vain.

Those who have devoted attention to the subject know and admit that ultimate and permanent relief can be secured in but one way; and that is by the exercise of persistent industry and rigid economy. This process, however, is necessarily a slow one, and it needs, and if possible must have, auxiliaries. If these cannot be furnished, it is manifest, Mr. Speaker, that we have witnessed but a prelude to the terrible financial ordeal through which we will have to pass.

Mr. Speaker, we ought not magnify this danger, nor will it do for us to ignore its existence. It may not be in our power to avert it; Indeed I fear it is not. This inability may be inherent, or it may be attributable to our lack of wisdom and the want of that spirit of patriotism which is indispensable when we undertake to legislate upon a subject that affects all sections, industries, and interests of the country. If this impending danger cannot be averted by reason of its nature and the unfortunate combination of circumstances by which it is attended, our responsibility ceases when we shall have faithfully put forth our efforts in that behalf; but if a selfish or sectional interest or any consideration other than the welfare of our whole country control our action, or so influence it as to prevent us from extending to the people the utmost and best possible relief, we cannot and ought not escape reproach.

In view of all the circumstances that perplex the consideration of this subject, the varied and conflicting interests involved, and the consequent diversity of opinions presented and arguments brought to bear in its discussion, I fear it is out of our power to accomplish much good by legislation; but that we should do something more than we have done, or even attempted in this behalf, cannot be doubted. What that is, is as difficult as it is important to determine.

If an early resumption of specie payment is the policy best adapted to the wants of the country, let it be adopted; if it is best to leave the currency in its present condition as to volume and character, let us so determine; and if an increase of the quantity, together with a change of its character in part, is wisest and best, as I verily believe, then let us adopt this method. One or the other of these plans we are compelled to accept.

The discussion has hitherto been chiefly confined to but two propositions, namely, specie payment or contraction, and inflation; and I believe no two members exactly agree as to the method by which either plan shall be carried out. Each seems to have some favorite scheme which he thinks the best that can be devised, and of course preferable to any other.

No one is, I believe, entirely satisfied with anything that has been done or proposed, though a majority of the members of each House seemed to think the provisions of the Senate bill were better than nothing, and perhaps the best that could be obtained.

I enter, Mr. Speaker, upon the discussion of this subject with much embarrassment, chiefly because of its magnitude and intricacy and partly by reason of the endless variety and conflict of views that have been expressed on this floor and at the other end of the Capitol, and by many of the ablest and most experienced financial minds in the land.

Furthermore, notwithstanding this question bears more directly and powerfully than any other upon the material interests of the whole people, its discussion does not seem to be listened to with that patient and candid attention the importance of the subject demands. Conclusions seem to have been reached by almost everybody both in and out of Congress, and ideas and arguments that are opposed to a fixed opinion are very apt to be ridiculed and pronounced absurd.

With reference to this subject there is, or at least there appears to be, an unwholesome degree of intolerance of the right of private judgment. Very many seem inclined, and a few determined,

To take the teachings of the schools,
And call them most unquestioned rules;
And flatly say that all are fools
Who doubt them.

In view of the grave difficulties we meet in our efforts to consider and settle the questions involved, it is not surprising that we are perplexed with doubts; nor does it appear strange, when we think of the extent to which great interests are to be affected, that there is an impatient attention to their discussion. This is probably attributable to our natural selfishness. Arguments in support of a policy that one believes would tend to increase or diminish his burdens, or that another may believe would increase or diminish his chances for reaping a golden harvest, touch the most sensitive chords in human nature, and accordingly give offense or gain approbation.

Mr. Speaker, the solution of the problem under consideration, by either a speedy return to specie payment or by an increase of the volume of the currency, will inevitably operate prejudicially to a greater or less extent to one or the other of the two classes into which the people are financially divided; that is, to the debtor or the creditor class. One of these classes must suffer more or less, and the other must be benefited, be our action what it may.

Which shall it be? There are, or at all events there should be, no favored classes in legislation; but we are in a dilemma from which we cannot escape without doing what I have indicated. Which, then, ought to be the favored class, and which shall it be? Shall we adopt that policy which will add to the burdens of the debtor and increase the wealth of the creditor class, or shall we, as far as lies in our power, endeavor to lift the burden from the former and impose it in a measure upon the latter? To these questions I have but one answer to give; and that is, let us, as far as is in our power, try to relieve the unfortunate debtor class, and afford them an opportunity to overcome the adverse fortune by which they have been overtaken; and at the same time do what we may and can to prevent unnecessary sacrifices by those who have been more highly favored and have escaped the horrors of financial embarrassment.

Let no one say, Mr. Speaker, that this is demagogism or the language of a demagogue. It is neither; but is an expression of a sincere conviction as to my duty, and as to the necessity that is imposed upon us and which we cannot escape. It may be said, indeed in effect has been said, that no such necessity exists. I would rejoice to know that it does not; but let us see. It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to stop and inquire from whence it came nor to what cause it is attributable, any more than it would be to stop and inquire from whence came the water in which I might see a fellow-creature about to drown, or what the origin of a fire in which he might be about to perish. These inquiries might come with some propriety, or rather without much impropriety, after the danger had been averted; but they would grate harshly on the ear while it was impending and imminent.

But is it unavoidably necessary that one or the other of the classes mentioned shall suffer by reason of any adjustment it is in our power to make of our financial troubles? I answer yes; one or the other will certainly and inevitably suffer to a greater or less extent, be our financial policy what it may.

Should we increase the volume of the currency, its purchasing power, it is manifest, will be proportionately diminished, while its paying power will of course remain unchanged. The market values of real estate and all commodities of trade will be increased; and the debtor class will thereby be enabled to convert their lands and other property into this representation of money and use it in extinguishing their liabilities; and it follows that, inasmuch as the paying power of this currency is undiminished, and its purchasing power is diminished, to the extent of that diminution will be the losses of the creditor class; it being confined, however, to the excess of their bills receivable over bills payable. This consequence is inevitable in the event of inflation. On the other hand, should we return to a specie basis at present or at any time in the near future, we would bring about like results; that is loss and gain; loss to the debtor, and gain to the creditor class; the result being exactly the reverse of what it would be in the event of inflation. We would, of course, thereby increase the purchasing power of our currency, and impose at least a corresponding burden or loss on the debtor class; as by the latter policy we would diminish the market values of real estate and all commodities of trade. These propositions are self-evident, but I have nevertheless thought it not improper to repeat them in this connection.

If legislation on this subject must injure some of us and some of our fellow-citizens, as a class, on which shall the inevitable burden be thrown? My answer has already been given. My opinions as to the effect of resumption may be incorrect. I admit I may have arrived at the most unwarranted conclusions in the premises; but, believing I have not, I am constrained to adhere to them.

In view of all the facts, no effect of any given cause seems more probable to my mind than that an early return to specie payment would prove sadly disastrous to the best interests of a large majority of the people. Indeed, I am unable to perceive how it would be possible to supply their demand for money with the present amount of currency. This demand will not abate, but continue; and will increase with the increase of our population. But even if it should not, there is, without additional legislation modifying the laws regulating the national banks and currency, a gloomy prospect before the debt-burdened masses; and it will become doubly so should we attempt an early return to specie payment.

In a certain sense, Mr. Speaker, all the people of the United States belong to what I denominated the debtor class. Each one of them is liable to pay, and does directly or indirectly pay, a part of the public debt; and to that extent he must be regarded as a debtor. This liability will attach to the citizens of the United States until their public debt shall be extinguished.

When and how that end will be accomplished is not a question to be discussed in this connection, nor is it one of easy solution. But it must be paid, and most of it with money or its equivalent; and it will be paid, unless it shall be repudiated, which would be a speedy and easy method of ridding ourselves of a great burden, but at the same time as disreputable as speedy, unless the duty of self-preservation shall force its adoption. And I will remark in this connection, Mr. Speaker, that I believe an early return, or rather an attempt at an early return to specie payment, (its accomplishment is impossible at the present time, or early future,) would almost compel the people to adopt it; and that they would in that event do so, regardless of consequences, is extremely probable.

In order to ascertain whether a speedy return to specie payment is possible I consider it proper, and not only proper but necessary, that we ascertain what amount we owe, to whom we owe it, when it will have to be paid, where the money is to come from with which to pay it, &c. Our debts are of two classes, public and private. The former consists of the national debt, State debts, and the debts of counties, cities, and towns; and the latter consists of debts due from citizens to one another and to banks and other corporations. Consequently this burden bears very unequally on the people, and must prove more oppressive to some than to others. In some of the States the local public debt of itself, saying nothing of national and private debts, is very great; so great, indeed, that the people are inclined to flee and many of them have fled from its presence.

But, Mr. Speaker, how much do we owe? When we once realize, if it is possible to comprehend, the magnitude of our indebtedness, we will, I verily believe, be more apt to ask ourselves whether it is possible to liquidate it in any manner, than to inquire whether it is expedient to do so with gold or its equivalent. Were I to assume that it is $10,000,000,000, I believe I would be within the range of probability. Let us ascertain as to this; for if it approximates this sum, all the arguments, it seems to me, in favor of specie payment are fully answered. As well might we expect to see the man who lies buried beneath the mountain avalanche rise up and bear away his burden, as to see the people patiently, or in any manner whatever, support or try to support the burden we would impose upon them by a resumption of specie payment.

The ascertained national debt on the 30th ultimo amounted to $2,149,725,277.02, after deducting coin, currency, and special deposits in the Treasury. Of this amount $1,724,035,750 bear interest in coin, and $14,678,000 in currency. More than two-thirds, or, to be exact, $1,214,234,500, bear interest at 6 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually in gold, and $509,802,250 bear interest at 5 per cent., payable in the same manner.

To this amount we must add $64,623,512 on account of the principal, and $18,627,743.43, on account of the interest, due and unpaid on the bonds issued by the Government of the United States to the various Pacific Railway Companies. To this we may add at least $250,000,000 more on account of just but unsettled claims against the Government pending before Congress, the Departments, the Court of Claims, and the southern claims commission.

The estimated indebtedness of the several States, counties, cities, and towns of the United States, in 1870 was $868,676,758. It is entirely safe to assume that it now amounts to at least a billion.

To all this must be added the private indebtedness of the people one to another, and to the banks, brokers, savings associations, insurance companies, and other moneyed institutions. The last annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that the aggregate of the loans and discounts of nineteen hundred and seventy-six national banks, on the 12th of September last, was $940,233,304.22. It further shows that the savings-banks organized and doing business in the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and the District of Columbia, held at the date of the last reports bills receivable, due on account of loans and discounts, amounting to the sum of $394,749,155. It further appears that the aggregate of the loans and discounts by the State banks and the savings-banks having capital stock, in the States of New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, was $119,332,341. We therefore have, in only nine of the States and the District of Columbia, an individual indebtedness of $514,081,496 to these various institutions.

We are left to conjecture as to the amount of indebtedness to similar institutions in the remaining twenty-eight States and the nine Territories: but it is entirely safe to assume that it is not less than $1,500,000,000, or something less than three times as great as it is in the nine States mentioned. We are also left to approximate the amount of private indebtedness existing between the forty millions of people who are so deeply interested in this subject, which has given them and their representatives so much trouble, and has occasioned so much anxiety and which will before they see the end of it, I fear, occasion them a great deal more than is now anticipated. Taking into consideration the facts that we as a people have during the last ten or twelve years been reckless and extravagant, reckless in our speculations and extravagant in our expenditures, I think we may safely assume our individual indebtedness is not less than $2,000,000,000.

To this fearful array of pecuniary liabilities must be added another item, that we may ascertain the grand total, and then consider, and if possible determine upon, our financial policy—I refer to the bonded and other indebtedness of the various railroad corporations of the United States. If it should be suggested that these are not the debts of the people, I reply that they are nevertheless debts, and will have to be paid either in currency or in coin, or their equivalent; and we must consider their existence, as well as that of the others mentioned, in determining upon the policy best adapted to the wants of the country.

We find from the best accessible statistics on this subject that the funded and other debts of these corporations amount to $1,511,578,944. Of this amount the New England States owe $101,597,046; the Middle States, $343,862,600; the Western States, $747,939,186; the Southern States, $230,230,112; and the Pacific States, $67,950,000.

The aggregate of all these liabilities, national, State, county, city, and so forth, is immensely great; and when we consider its magnitude, we feel, as I have before remarked, more like inquiring as to the possibility of paying it in any manner than like attempting to devise a method by which we may pay it in coin, either at the present or any future time.

In order, Mr. Speaker, that we may bring this subject more forcibly before our minds, let us recapitulate, and ascertain, and if possible comprehend, the grand total of our liabilities. It is not only wise for us to do so, but an imperative duty. I do not doubt that the total is greater than I make it, but we will assume that it is not.

Let us therefore ascertain the probable amount of the liabilities mentioned:

Our national debt proper is	$2,149,725,277 02
Bonds to railway companies	64,023,512 00
Interest on bonds	18,627,743 43
Unsettled liabilities, (estimated)	250,000,000 00
State and municipal	1,000,000,000 00
Loans, &c., by national banks	944,233,304 22
Loans, &c., by State banks, &c.	514,081,496 00
Loans, &c., by same in twenty-eight States, &c., (estimated)	1,500,000,000 00
Individuals to each other, &c., (estimated)	2,000,000,000 00
Funded, &c., of railroads	1,511,578,944 00
Making the fearful total of	9,952,870,027 67

This aggregate is almost incomprehensible. It exceeds $248 per capita, were it equally divided between, or rather did it bear equally on, all the people, which it does not, for the reasons already mentioned.

With this enormous debt hanging over the country and the accruing interest thereon, together with the necessarily large and increasing cost of administering the Government, it seems absurd to talk about resuming specie payment, or fixing the time for doing so. Nay, I go further and assert that it would be little less than criminal to attempt it. Not that any honest and sane man could object to paying the debt in that manner if we were able; but because of the inevitable ruin it would bring on those whom we should favor rather than oppress—those who are engaged in developing the mineral and agricultural resources of the country, or are employed in manufactures, or in some other of its productive industries.

It must be manifest, Mr. Speaker, to every candid mind that our existing debt will for generations hang like an incubus on the industries and energies of the people and consume the fruits of their labor despite all they can do, or ought to do, or attempt, unless, by reason of unwise and oppressive legislation, they shall be forced to ask and obtain relief by repudiation—a remedy I would most earnestly and sincerely deprecate under ordinary circumstances, but which under circumstances that are possible, if not probable, I would consider a righteous act. But, whether right or wrong, it will be sought and enforced, sooner or later, in the event of a conflict or discontent provoked by legislation that favors the creditor and oppresses the debtor class, or favors capital and oppresses labor—an event which nothing would have a greater tendency to precipitate than the resumption of specie payment while the masses are struggling against adversity in the form of the most oppressive taxation to support the Government and pay an unprecedented public debt, as well as an enormous debt of their own contracting.

I have said that we can do nothing in the way of legislation touching our finances that will not entail a loss on either the debtor or the creditor class. This I regard as a fact that cannot be successfully controverted. But I go further and state that in the event we do nothing whatever, but leave our financial affairs just as they are, and leave our national banking system just as it is, the debtor class will continue to suffer, and will grow poorer from year to year, and in the same proportion will grow that spirit of discontent which oppression and injustice always produce, and which is most dangerous to the peace, and in a word, to all the best interests of society.

This class, Mr. Speaker, I mean the debtor class, comprises in my opinion at least two-thirds of all the people in the United States. It embraces also, especially in the West and South, most of those whose industries are productive and whose present pecuniary embarrassment is in a great measure attributable to the fact that they contracted debts expecting to discharge them, not with gold or its equivalent, but with currency, the value of which regulated prices at the time they were contracted. It embraces farmers, mechanics, miners, tradesmen, &c., who should not be permitted to suffer if it can be avoided; and especially should they not be caused to suffer by legislation that will necessarily and greatly diminish the value of their labor and its products, and in many thousands of instances render hopeless their efforts to emancipate themselves from debt.

If then, Mr. Speaker, two-thirds of the people belong to the debtor class, that is, those who are unable to pay their debts without selling the whole or part of their real or personal property, or both, it follows that any legislation that tends to diminish market values is detrimental to the interests of the majority and beneficial to the minority or creditor class. To what extent market values would be diminished by resumption no one can tell, but it is probable the reduction would exceed the apprehensions of the most timid.

The fine-spun and plausible theories and arguments of the redemptionists are not new. They have been presented and urged for more than a century; but it is insisted that they are not suited to the present financial condition and necessities of the people of the United States. Like many other abstract theories (and they certainly are abstract so far as we are now concerned) they are true, but are nevertheless impracticable.

Straight lines are the shortest distances between given points. It would be great economy of time and labor to travel these lines; yet we seldom do so. We do not go from New York to San Francisco, nor Liverpool, nor Havana by a straight line, for the simple reason that in addition to the impossibility of doing so it would be disastrous to attempt it. For the same reasons I do not favor resumption of specie payment, either at the present time nor at any time to be certainly indicated. They who think it possible and advisable to return to a specie basis must have their minds fatally wedded to mere theories or their judgments strangely perverted by self-interest. I will not say that any gentleman on this floor is influenced by corrupt motives in this behalf, for I do not believe such is the case; but as "a gift blindeth the mind," so does gold or glory, or the prospect of acquiring the one or achieving the other, often pervert our understandings and cause us to make mistakes. "Our virtues," says another, "often disappear when put in competition with our interests, as rivers lose themselves in the ocean."

Mr. Speaker, the financial distress that exists and has for some time existed throughout the length and breadth of the land cannot be relieved, but will most certainly be intensified, by a contraction of the volume of the currency. This, I believe, no one doubts; but it has been said, and often repeated, that we have as much currency as the people need; that those who think otherwise do not comprehend the occult science and axioms of political economy; that the expansionists seem to think money can be legislated into the pockets of the people; that the advocates of specie payment are the friends of the poor and laboring class, &c.; not one word of which is true, except that the "occult science and its axioms" are not comprehended; and if they were, the knowledge would be of little avail in our financial dilemma.

I do not believe the present volume of currency is as great as it should be, nor is all of it of the kind that should be furnished the people. I by no means favor reckless or extravagant inflation, but I believe that we need more currency, and that its character, in part, should be changed; or, in other words, that our national-bank currency should be retired as soon as possible, and its place supplied with United States Treasury notes. This I regard as all-important, whether the volume of the currency shall or shall not be increased. I have thought, and I still think, an increase is necessary, though I regard this as less important than any of the other propositions relating to our finances.

I assume that we need a greater per capita circulation than any of the nations of Europe. This necessity grows out of the vast extent of our territory, the sparseness of our population, the remoteness of our largest and most productive agricultural and mineral districts from our commercial centers, and the consequent delay in exchanges. Notwithstanding this necessity, we have to-day a smaller per capita circulation than any other people of like commercial importance. We have outstanding—

Old demand notes	$76, 777 50
Legal-tender notes	382, 000, 000 00
Fractional currency	47, 436, 620 74
National-bank currency	348, 350, 949 00
In all	777, 864, 347 24
Deduct on account of losses and reserves, say	170, 000, 000 00
Leaving in circulation	607, 864, 347 24

Which is not more than fifteen dollars per capita, and is probably less.

There may be those who will question the reasonableness of the sum deducted on account of losses and reserves; but when we recall the fact that a part of this currency has been in circulation for more than twelve years and a very large proportion for over ten years, and when we recall the further fact that several millions are known to have been destroyed in the Boston and Chicago fires, we can scarcely doubt that the estimate is below the correct amount.

England, it is claimed, has $23.60 per capita, North Germany $20.64, and France $34.72; while we, though needing more than either of them, have less, and are threatened with a reduction of this pittance. It may be said that these nations have much larger metallic reserves than we; but this does not determine nor in any manner affect the necessity under which we are placed in this behalf.

I have stated, Mr. Speaker, that our system of banking is pernicious, and that it should be materially changed or discontinued. With reference to this proposition there is scarcely room for doubt. It may be a most difficult work to accomplish, owing to the fast hold the national banks have taken upon our financial affairs, and the immense influence they can and do wield in the counsels of the nation; but it is nevertheless, as we shall see, an urgent and all-important necessity.

The system is so thoroughly understood, that I need not stop to explain it; but I beg attention to a few facts, showing its operation and effect, and in my opinion warranting the conclusion I have reached and expressed.

Under the law authorizing it, 2,123 of these institutions have been organized. Of these, 148 have been closed, leaving at the present time 1,975 in active operation. These had, on the 1st of October, 1873, an outstanding circulation of $348,350,949; and on the 12th day of September preceding, at which time there were 1,976 in operation, they had due them from the people, as shown by the Comptroller's report, $944,220,116.34 for loans and discounts—almost three times the amount of their outstanding circulation. At the same time they had in the hands of the Treasurer of the United States, as security for their circulation, registered bonds amounting to $392,852,100, on $235,017,150 of which they are entitled to and have received interest semi-annually in gold at 5 per cent. per annum, and on the residue $157,834,950 at 6 per cent. The simple interest that had been paid on these bonds (since the organization of the first national bank in 1863) amounted January 1, 1874, to $185,344,246.50. It was paid semi-annually, and if compounded semi-annually at 6 per cent. it would exceed $250,000,000.

It is true the banks have had to keep certain reserves on account of their circulation and deposits, but they have in most cases utilized, or so used them rather, as to make them yield interest. It is also true that they have been subjected to taxation, but there is no hardship in this; every citizen is subjected to the same burden. Moreover, within the time they were receiving their almost two hundred millions in semi-annual installments in gold, they only paid, and that in currency, taxes to the amount of $49,716,055.98.

We find, furthermore, that 1,912 of these banks during the six months ending March 1, 1873, made net earnings to the amount of $31,926,478 on their capital and surplus; and during the six months ending September 1, 1873, they show net earnings on same to the amount of $33,122,000. There were 1,955 of them in operation during the last-mentioned period. They had, during the former period, capital stock $480,518,683, and surplus, $114,257,288, making an aggregate of $594,775,971, on which they show net earnings of 5.37 per cent. within that period; and during the latter period they had capital stock $488,100,951, and surplus, $118,113,848, aggregating $606,214,799, on which they show net earnings of 5.46 per cent., or 10.83 per cent. per annum. (See Appendix.) The aggregated net earnings of all these banks for said year were $65,048,478, which is equal to 16.55 per cent. on their $392,852,100 in registered bonds in the Treasury. These extraordinary earnings, be it remembered, are net; that is, they are found after deducting officers' salaries, clerk-hire, attorneys' fees, revenue-stamps, and other expenses. Ought a financial system that is so expensive to the people be suffered to continue, especially when a cheaper one may be easily devised? Surely not.

Practically it is about as follows: A being indebted to sundry persons to a very large amount issues his bonds, bearing a fair rate of interest per annum, and puts them on the market. He then gets B to take say $392,852,100 worth at their face value, promising to pay the interest semi-annually and the principal in thirty years. At the time A receives the money and B the bonds, A also issues to B say $354,000,000 in bank-notes, on the face of each of which B promises to pay the amount thereon specified, and A in effect guarantees the payment of the entire amount. By the terms of the contract B is allowed to circulate these notes as money under certain unimportant limitations and restrictions, and to engage in a general banking business for an indefinite length of time not exceeding, we will suppose, thirty years. By this arrangement B practically gets the use of $746,852,100 by reason of what we may call a loan to A of but little over half that amount; for the latter pays a fair rate of interest on his bonds, and virtually borrows back from B at a still higher rate of interest nearly the whole of his capital, or the three hundred and fifty-four millions issued and delivered to him as before stated; or, in other words, B so manages as to get from A 16.55 per cent. per annum on all the money he loaned him, instead of 5 and 6 per cent., the rate specified on the face of the bonds.

We have seen that the loans and discounts of these banks in September last amounted to nearly $1,000,000,000, or at least that they were equal to two and two-fifths times the face value of the bonds deposited with the treasurer as security for the redemption of the circulation. By adding the amount of loans and discounts to the bonds on which the banks are collecting interest from the Government we have the sum of $1,337,072,216 as their productive capital at the time mentioned. This being the fact, it is not surprising that their profits are as great as we have seen they are.

If the system is a good one, and conducive to the best interests of the people, it should of course be perpetuated, and if pernicious it cannot be too quickly abandoned.

Let us see, then, a little further as to its outworkings by supposing it shall be continued for thirty years without an increase of circulation or privileges, either as proposed in the bills that have been before the House or otherwise. We have already seen that the average profits in one year were 16.55 per cent. on the capital invested, or at all events on the face value of the bonds deposited; but lest this may be greater than is or will be ordinarily realized, we will assume 10 per cent. per annum, paid semi-annually, at the end of each six months, as a fair average, though it is well known that loans and discounts are seldom made on paper that has more than four months to mature, and that interest and discount are invariably collected in advance.

Let us ascertain what amount of interest will be realized in thirty years on the $354,000,000 of national-bank circulation allowed by the act of June 3, 1864, and the amendatory act of July 12, 1870, at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, compounded semi-annually. The amount of interest earned by the $354,000,000 will express the weight of the burden the system will unnecessarily and unjustly impose on the people, should it be continued for the period mentioned, and proportionately so long as it shall be continued.

We find that the $354,000,000 of currency will yield, in interest, in thirty years, calculating interest at 10 per cent. and compounding it semi-annually, $6,608,861,400; each dollar yielding in that period a net profit of $17.6691. This profit will be realized independent of such gains as necessarily result from the loss and destruction of the currency, which would probably, in that length of time, exceed a hundred millions.

But, without resorting to any supposition as to this, we find net earnings by these banks, on what we may term an imaginary capital, that are more than three times as great as our ascertained national debt. Should any one insist that such profits would be impossible, I reply that they might be greater, inasmuch as the result of the past year's transactions shows that they have been more than 50 per cent. in excess of the supposed rate.

But to place the matter in its most favorable light, I will suppose the net earnings to be 8 per cent. per annum or 4 per cent. semi-annually, and ascertain to what extent this would lighten the burden. At this rate the $354,000,000 would yield in interest alone in thirty years the sum of $3,368,062,200, each dollar at that rate of interest yielding in that period a net profit of $9.5143. We thus find that the net earnings on the $354,000,000, at 8 per cent., are more than one and a half times greater than our national debt; and that without adding anything for profits resulting from the loss and destruction of the currency.

I am not unmindful of the fact that these earnings are made up in part from the interest collected on the bonds deposited with the Treasurer by these corporations. But permit me, Mr. Speaker, to call attention in this connection to the further fact, that the estimate is probably 5 per cent. below the actual ratio of net earnings on the $392,852,100 actually invested.

These facts, Mr. Speaker, are worthy our careful consideration; and if they are as stated, the conclusion is irresistible that the evils of our national banking system cannot be too speedily corrected.

Mr. Speaker, there are many grave objections that relate merely to the manner in which the law authorizing and regulating the national banks and currency is executed. These, however, are not fundamental, and hence need not be made the subject of remark at this time. They could be removed, but the objections to the system cannot be.

The question then arises, what shall be done, or rather what can be done, to better our condition in this respect in view of all the attending circumstances?

At the time the organization of national banks was authorized by Congress, it is possible a better system could not have been devised; but I most unhesitatingly say we should now very materially modify the system, or supply its place with another that will prove less oppressive to the country, and better calculated to improve its financial condition. One step in that direction will be taken, if we will provide for the withdrawal of the national-bank circulation, and at the same time for supplying its place with legal-tender Treasury notes. If this can be done we ought to do it; and if it cannot be done we ought to know it, and know it at once.

Can it be done? I can see no good reason why it may not be. If we can once be brought to a realization of the fact that the public good is paramount to all local or personal considerations we will not thereafter long delay suitable action. If, however, there is a factious opposition in the way, let us see and know from whence it comes, why it is interposed, what it is based upon, what it proposes to do, and what hope, if any, it encourages, and what promise it makes of relief from the growing injustice of this monstrous system.

It has, as I have before stated, a fast hold upon the people by reason of its nearly one thousand millions in loans and discounts; and influences and agencies are at work to perpetuate its existence. They may, indeed I fear they will, succeed; but like all other oppressions it will some day have an end, and it is our duty to indicate the time when that end shall come and the manner in which it shall be brought about. It should be done gradually, and in such manner as will subject those who are immediately concerned, either as stockholders or borrowers, to the least possible inconvenience and annoyance.

If we shall fix a time at which all these banks shall commence retiring their circulation, then the minimum amount which they shall retire per month, and at the same time provide a method for supplying in its stead and in the ratio of its withdrawal another and a better currency, we will render the country a signal service, and will do no injustice whatever to those who have invested their money in these institutions.

My views as to the time and manner in which these things may and ought to be done are indicated in the bill read at the Clerk's desk. Some of its provisions may not be necessary, and others may require modification, but I do not now perceive any very material changes I would make.

I will not at present discuss its provisions further than to merely allude to one or two of its prominent features, and state what would be their probable effect. In the first place it would increase the amount of our currency. The amount thereby authorized to be issued being four hundred millions in Treasury notes, the increase would be $46,000,000. In the next place it would ultimately, if I am not mistaken, result in the redemption of $392,852,100 of our 5 and 6 per cent. bonds. In the next place it would supply convertible bonds; whereby both the Government and its citizens would be immensely benefited. The former, at a moderate estimate, would save interest on its bonds alone at least $14,000,000 annually; and the latter would make at least $7,000,000, which now go into the hands of their bankers in the way of profits on deposits. There can be no kind of doubt that many millions, indeed hundreds of millions of dollars, that have hitherto been kept on deposit in the banks would be invested in the 3.65 per cent. bonds. Every one who might have even fifty dollars that he did not want to use would invest in a three sixty-five gold-bearing bond, knowing he could convert it into legal-tenders whenever he had occasion to do so. Hence hundreds of millions of dollars that have been carried by the banks as deposits, and which have enabled them to make such large profits, would seek this temporary but safe and exceedingly convenient mode of temporary investment.

The chief objection to the Senate bill that occurred to my mind was that it necessarily perpetuated the existence of the national banks, and to that extent placed, or would have placed, I should say, the country more effectually than before at the mercy of these corporations. It would have increased their circulation $46,000,000, and would have placed a proportionate amount of Government bonds in the hands of the Treasurer as security for that circulation; but at the same time it would have proportionately increased the evils which I believe and have endeavored to show are inseparably connected with the system, and would have fastened them on the country for years, and perhaps for generations to come.

The House bill now pending in the Senate is even more objectionable, inasmuch as it provides for, or rather contemplates, the organization of an indefinite number of banks; and, consequently, an indefinite increase of national-bank circulation. This feature alone is sufficient to warrant the rejection of the measure, though it passed the House by a very decided majority. Should it become a law, of which I have but little fear, I would expect to see results quite as disastrous in the end as I anticipate would follow the immediate resumption of specie payments.

Why, Mr. Speaker, should we increase the number and power of the national banks? I have not yet seen a substantial reason in support of the proposition to do so. And why should we perpetuate their existence with their present privileges beyond the time that may be reasonably required to supplant their circulation by the introduction of legal-tender Treasury notes? I can see no reason, unless it be that the interest, power, and influence of the nineteen hundred and seventy-five banks that stud our towns and cities, are felt and feared in our councils, to such an extent as to render impossible the accomplishment of the undertaking. Other and greater reasons may exist, but if so they are unknown to me.

It is proper, Mr. Speaker, for me to state in conclusion that I have no hostile nor even unkind feelings toward any one who is in any manner interested in or connected with these institutions. Many of my personal and valued friends are connected with them in various ways, and I am myself to a very small extent interested in one of them as a stockholder.

My objections to them, therefore, whether just or unjust, and my opposition, whether wise or unwise, result from a sincere conviction that the system is pernicious, and that the best interests of the country demand that it be modified or abandoned.

If this or that can and shall be done at the appropriate time and in the appropriate manner, and we can secure a convertible currency, as provided in the bill read at the beginning of these remarks, I anticipate the best of results and an earlier and more satisfactory return to a specie basis than is possible by any other plan that has been proposed.

SETTLERS UPON PUBLIC LANDS WITHIN RAILROAD LIMITS.

Mr. LOWE. Mr. Speaker, at an early day in this session I introduced a bill for the protection of the rights of settlers upon the public lands within railroad limits, which is now pending and to which I desire to invite the attention of the House. I send the bill to the Clerk's desk and desire that its text be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no pre-emption location, homestead entry, or other settlement, entry, or filing, in pursuance of any law of the United States, upon lands in Kansas within the limits of any grant of lands to any railroad company or to the State of Kansas for the use of any railroad company, which was made or which attached to such lands at any time before the actual withdrawal of such lands from market and sale was made, shall be deemed or held to be inoperative, illegal, or void, by reason of the same having been made or having attached after any alleged location of the route or line of the railroad to which such grant of land appertained; and all such locations, settlements, entries, and filings, which have been canceled by or under the direction of the Interior Department, or any officer thereof, or which are now held for cancellation, are hereby ratified and confirmed, except as to any cause other than that herein specified; and in the cases herein provided for, upon the proper proofs and payment being made, patents shall issue to the proper claimants as in other cases; and in all such cases, if the proper time for making such proofs and payment has elapsed, proofs and payment may be made at the proper local land office within one year from the passage of this act.

Mr. LOWE. As framed, the bill is confined to the State of Kansas, but at the proper time I shall move its amendment by striking out the words restricting it to that State, so as to make the operation of the bill general. The propriety and the necessity of this legislation arise from the following state of facts:

From September 20, 1850, when the first grant of land in aid of the construction of a railroad was made to the Illinois Central Railroad Company, to March 3, 1871, when the last grant of that character was made to the New Orleans, Baton Rouge and Vicksburgh Railroad Company, acts have been passed granting lands to aid in the construction of about one hundred railroads. During all this time the general laws of the country for the sale and disposal of the public domain have remained in force. Since 1841 all the surveyed public lands to which the Indian title had been extinguished have been open to entry and settlement under the pre-emption act of that year, and since 1862 they have likewise been open to homestead entry under the homestead law of that year. Naturally the operation of railroad grants frequently came in competition and not rarely in collision with the claims of purchasers and settlers under the pre-emption and homestead laws. The execution of these laws, both land grant and general acts, was committed to the same Executive Department of the Government, and that Department of necessity has been compelled to construe and apply the various acts with a view to their just and proper enforcement. It has been the uniform practice of the Government under existing legislation to withdraw from general settlement and disposal the lands granted to railroads as soon as such lands could be ascertained and identified. Up to a recent date the practice and usage of the Executive Department have been to respect and recognize as valid all claims and entries under the homestead and pre-emption laws which were properly initiated and made before the lands were withdrawn from market and to carry such claims into patent, although they fell within the limits of railroad grants. When this practice was observed but little difficulty and conflict occurred in reference to the rights of claimants under different laws. But within the last year or two a new line of decisions and of construction has been adopted and now prevails, by which thousands of settlers who have entered upon lands under the homestead and pre-emption laws, who made their locations in strict conformity to the rules and regulations of the Executive Department, and in conformity to the interpretation of the laws as administered and expounded by the officers charged with the duty of construing and executing them, are threatened with expulsion from their lands and homes, and with the further loss of all the improvements and values they have added thereto.

The present line of construction and ruling in the Interior Department is in brief this: that a railroad grant attaches to the granted lands at the time the line or route of the railroad is "definitely fixed," without regard to the time when the lands are withdrawn from market, and that the route is definitely fixed at the date of the survey in the field, when such survey is made in accordance with a previous resolution of the board of directors of a company; or, when a route is adopted by the board of directors subsequent to survey, the time of such adoption is regarded as the date at which the route becomes definitely fixed. The result and effect of this are, that all homesteads and pre-emption entries and filings made after what is now regarded as the definite location of the road, and before the withdrawal of the lands from market, are held to be inoperative and void, and all such entries, as fast as such facts are shown to the Department, are canceled, and the lands wrested from settlers and awarded to the railroad companies. That I may not by any possibility be supposed to be mistaken as to the change of ruling by the Department, or as to its present attitude upon this subject, I refer to official papers. I hold in my hand and send to the Clerk's desk to be read a copy of an official letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an appeal of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad Company from the decision of the Commissioner refusing to cancel certain entries.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, April 14, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith papers on appeal from the decisions contained in my letters to the district land officers at Independence, Kansas, dated February 24 last, Topeka, February 27, and Salina, February 24 and 28, and March 3 last, refusing to cancel the following homestead entries upon the application of the attorney for the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad Company, who claim the lands as inuring to the grant to said company, to wit. * * * [Here follow the entries at the Independence, Topeka, and Salina offices.] * * *

These entries are of a similar character to those referred to in your decisions of September 3 and December 19 last, in the cases of A. W. Nickell et al., and Frank Hatke vs. The Saint Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company, having been made upon railroad lands after the definite location of the road, but before the date of withdrawal, in accordance with the rulings of the Department then in force; and as the grants are of the same character, it was in accordance with these decisions that I declined to cancel the entries. The further suggestion is made that the language of the fourth section of the act, requiring the Secretary, "as soon as said company shall file * * * maps of its line designating the route thereof, * * * to withdraw from the market the lands granted," presupposes the fact that such lands were intended to remain in market until such maps should be filed for the protection of the company, and if the withdrawal was made within a reasonable time after such filing the duty of the Secretary was performed under the law, and the company cannot take advantage of any laches of its own in failing to file such map immediately upon its definite location, and thereby securing to itself the full measure of its grant in place at that time and indemnity for such lands as had been then disposed of. After such definite location, and prior to the withdrawal, I do not understand the law to protect the company or to give any indemnity, as it was the business of the company, and not of the Department, to take the first steps, by filing, if necessary, a map of general route toward securing their grant unimpaired.

This view of the law is made necessary, in my judgment, in order to give effect to the provisions of the fourth section, under the rule requiring every portion of a statute to be enforced if its enforcement is possible without violation of what is clearly provided for in other parts of the same.

The first section simply defines the rights of indemnity under the grant generally made. The fourth section specifically sets forth the manner in which a withdrawal shall be made "to effect the purposes of the act, and subserve the public interest." The papers submitted are as follows: First, homestead paper marked A; second, extracts of letters containing my decisions, B; third, attorney's letters and arguments, C.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

WILLIS DRUMMOND,
Commissioner.

Hon. C. DELANO,
Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LOWE. It thus appears that the Commissioner adhered to the former practice and declined to cancel the entries, the same having been made before the withdrawal of the land, although after what is now regarded as the date of the definite location.

I now send to the Clerk's desk a copy of the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, reversing this decision of the Commissioner and awarding the lands to the railroad company, in pursuance of what he acknowledges to be a new rule of practice and construction.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, July 17, 1873.

SIR: I have examined the questions presented by your letter of April 14, 1873, transmitting the appeal of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad Company from recent decisions of your office, refusing to cancel certain homestead entries of lands made within the limits of its grant subsequent to the definite location of the line of the road, but prior to the order of the Secretary withdrawing the lands from market.

Your claim in this case is based upon a conclusion of law, supposed to have been adopted by the acting Secretary in the recent cases of A. W. Nickell et al. and Frank Hatke vs. The Saint Jo and Denver Railroad Company. I learn from the Acting Secretary, who decided said cases, that he did it with the understanding that patents had actually been issued in each of them in accordance with the construction of law adopted by the Department and in force at the time the patents were issued. In point of fact, however, patents had not issued in such cases, or either of them, and the decisions of the Acting Secretary are capable of a construction never intended for them, and have led to some confusion between your office and the Department, resulting from the mistake of fact upon which they were founded.

It was intended to be held in said cases that inasmuch as patents had actually been executed in them in accordance with a construction of the act creating the railroad company which had been adopted by the Department and was in force at the time the patents were executed, they would be considered as res adjudicata and would not be disturbed, although the former rule of construction had been changed by the Department and a new and different one adopted, which new rule was in force at the time the cases were heard and decided.

I now hold, and you will adopt the rule for your future guidance in this case and all like it, that in all cases where patents have actually been executed in accordance with a construction of law adopted by the Department and in force at the time of the execution of the patents, the patents will not be canceled or set aside upon any subsequent controversy arising between the different claimants, but the parties will be left to their remedies in court and the cases will be treated as res adjudicata. But in all cases where the controversy arises before patent has been executed the rule of conclusion adopted by the Department and in force at the time of the hearing in all its stages and before any proper officer or officers will be applied and the case decided in accordance with it, although it may differ from the rule recognized by the Department at the time the respective proceedings were commenced.

In the case now under consideration the right of the railroad attached upon the definite location of its road, and before any of the filings of the contesting parties were made. These filings were made before the withdrawal of the lands, but under the construction now adopted by this Department the right of the railroad attached at the time of definite location, and not, as formerly held, at the time of withdrawal. No patents have been executed, and under the law, as I understand it, and the rule above stated, the right of the railroad is superior to that of other parties, and your decision should be reversed. I therefore reverse the same, and herewith return the papers transmitted with your letter of April 14, 1873.

Very respectfully,

C. DELANO, Secretary.

Hon. W. DRUMMOND,
Commissioner General Land Office.

Mr. LOWE. In verification of the correctness of my understanding and statement of what is now regarded by the Department as definitely fixing the location of the road, I cite the language of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in an official letter to myself upon this subject under date of January 20, 1874. He says:

It is held by the Department that where a survey is made in accordance with a resolution of a board of directors of a company authorizing the same, the dates of such survey in the field are to be taken as the definite location of the road. But when the line of route is subsequently adopted by the board of directors as their definite location, the date of such adoption governs.

From the application of these rules, it occurs that between the date at which the railroad grant is held to attach and the date of the withdrawal of the lands a period of more or less time intervenes, in some cases not considerable but in others many months, and in some cases over a year; and during this period the ordinary disposal of the lands to pre-emptors and homesteaders proceeds, and their claims are subsequently annulled in behalf of the railroad claimants. By way of illustration I refer to a few cases from the great mass that might be cited. The grant to the Missouri Pacific, Southern Branch, between Junction City and Council Grove (now Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad) is now held to attach from date of survey in the field, which was between September 5 and 21, 1866. The withdrawal was by order of March 19, 1867, giving an intervening period of six months from the supposed vesting of the grant to the withdrawal of the lands.

The grant to the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad is held to attach from the date of the adoption by the board of directors of the line of the survey, which as to a portion of the road was November 15, 1866, and as to the remainder, October 15, 1867; as to the former the withdrawal was by order of April 30, 1867, and the latter January 21, 1868, showing an intervening period as to a portion of the line of five months, and as to the remainder of the line three months.

The grant to the Missouri River, Fort Scott, and Gulf road is held to attach from the date of the adoption of the survey by the board of directors, February 11, 1868. The lands were withdrawn by orders of June 12 and October 19, 1869, leaving as to the first withdrawal an intervening period of one year and four months, and as to the second withdrawal a period of one year and eight months.

The dates at which these grants are held to attach I derive from the last report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, pages 300 and 301; the dates of withdrawal I have from the Commissioner of the General Land Office by letter to myself of January 30, 1874.

A sharp case of change of front as to the supposed vesting of railroad titles is furnished in the case of the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad and the Union Pacific, Southern Branch.

Official instructions under date of October 21, 1869, to the register and receiver of public lands at Humboldt, Kansas, were issued by Hon. Joseph S. Wilson, Commissioner of the General Land Office, as to entries upon the Osage lands in Kansas. The seventh paragraph of those instructions is in these words:

Seventh. That according to the rulings of the department the right of the Lawrence, Leavenworth and Galveston, and the Union Pacific, Southern Branch, Railroads to the Osage lands attached at and from the date of the receipt at the district land office of our notice of withdrawal, namely, February 4, 1868, and such withdrawal is notice to settlers thereon of the railroad claim.

And yet, as seen by the Commissioner's report of 1873, it is now held that the grant to the Union Pacific, Southern Branch, (Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad,) attached October 15, 1867, and that of the Leavenworth, Lawrence, and Galveston, November 26, 1867, antedating the first decision as to one of the roads three months and the other four months, and thus invalidating and annulling, so far as an executive order could do so, the titles acquired during the intervening period.

The bill under consideration seeks only to restore that construction of existing laws and the practice under and application of the same which shall preserve to bona fide claimants under the homestead and pre-emption laws their right to the lands acquired by them from the Government before such lands were withdrawn from market and while they were held out and offered by the Government to entry, sale, and settlement under existing laws. It is not sought to affect any vested right; but this measure is advanced in the belief that a wrong and unfounded construction has been placed upon the land-grant acts, which is inflicting evils of such magnitude as call for this definitive and explanatory legislation.

The various land-grant acts contain substantially the same granting clause in form and effect, and for the purpose of comment and by way of illustration I cite the material parts of the granting clause in the grant in aid of the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad and branches, which is as follows:

That there be, and is hereby, granted * * * every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers for ten sections in width on each side of said road and each of its branches. But in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the lines or routes of said roads and branches are definitely fixed, sold any section or any part thereof granted as aforesaid, or that the right of homestead or pre-emption settlement has attached to the same, * * * then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause to be selected for the purposes aforesaid other lands equal to those thus appropriated, &c. (Statutes at Large, volume 12, page 772, section 1.)

It has always been held that such an act did not make a present operative grant, but that the grant was in the nature of a float to become located by subsequent events. From the nature of the case they could not become operative and localized before the route of the road should be definitely fixed. The important question in these acts, therefore, is: What is the meaning and operation of the words "definitely fixed?" This is a matter of construction and interpretation, and in its construction regard must be had to other laws which provide for the disposal of the same lands and to the circumstances of the subject-matter under consideration. Any just interpretation of these words must be such as will lead to exact and like results in principle in all actual or probable cases. A construction which should embrace cases leading to absurd and inconsistent conclusions could not be a just interpretation. A construction which should necessarily lead to a conflict of titles and rights under different statutes could not be a just interpretation unless plainly required by the words of the act itself. It does not follow, that because the line of a road is "definitely fixed" in the mind of an engineer or in the minds of a board of directors that it is thereby "definitely fixed" within the meaning of the statute. The railroad claim is that the designation of a route by or under the authority of a board of directors makes the line "definitely fixed" within the statute, and that from the time of such designation the grant attaches.

The first objection to this is that the act does not say so, and the second is that it leads to absurd and vicious results. The law does not say that title shall vest when the route is fixed by a survey upon the earth, nor when fixed by resolution of the board of directors, and it is wholly gratuitous to assume that such is its meaning without regard to other considerations and the effect of such construction. A grant is made of land from the public domain in aid of a railroad, and a board of directors instructs an engineer to survey a line of road between two points a hundred miles apart and resolves that such shall be the permanent route of the road as so surveyed. Does such survey then "definitely fix" the line of the road within the meaning of the statute so that the grant attaches thereby? If so, then this state of facts occurs: The engineer starts his survey at the point A and proceeds toward B. Every length of chain he measures eo instanti appropriates so much land and no more, so that as he advances he appropriates in effect the lands by lengths of his chain. Suppose he stops at night with his last peg driven opposite the middle of a quarter-section of land and before he begins again a settler has settled upon or entered the quarter-section. Would it belong to the railroad or the settler? Again, if such a process does effectually appropriate the land to the railroad it does so without the possibility of a settler or any officer of the Government knowing that such is the case. The settler has been to the land office; he finds the land there on the Government plats vacant, open for settlement and entry; he proceeds to the land. Suppose as matter of fact he finds a survey going on in the neighborhood. He has no knowledge, no means of knowledge whether such survey is a preliminary survey, an experimental line, or a final, determinate survey; and if out of abundant caution he should inquire, no one would be bound to answer his inquiries or to tell him the facts; nor if he should be informed would the statement be binding upon anybody. Again, if he sees the line staked out upon the ground he has no means of knowing whether the survey is definite and established by previous order of a board of directors or whether the line and survey are still to undergo the supervision and order of a board of directors thereafter; nor has he any means of ascertaining the action of the board of directors. The settler is in Kansas, or Colorado, or Minnesota hunting an humble home under what he believes the invitation of a paternal Government, and the board of directors are in Kansas City, or Chicago, or Boston resolving away the public lands out of his reach in spite of pre-emption and homestead laws and in defiance of the fact that on that day and hour the Government, through its local land office by its authorized officers, is offering him a home upon the land. The board of directors sits in private, its proceedings are private, its records are private, no one has a right to inspect them; if the settler could possibly reach the office of the company no one is bound to give him any information. The resolution in effect supposed to appropriate the land may be made to-day and withheld from all the world for weeks and months. No law prescribes the time within which the action shall be communicated to the Government, and in point of fact several months ordinarily elapse before the Department is officially advised and the lands withdrawn from sale. Certainly such results as these were never intended by the legislation under review.

But suppose the survey is first made and the directors act upon and adopt it afterward. In this case equally with the other the settler has no means of knowing where the rights of the Government and his own rights end and those of the railroad begin. The line of road is probably a thousand miles from the directors, their proceedings and records are hid in their own offices, and no means exist of knowing their action until that action is made a matter of record in the Department of the Secretary of the Interior; and it is optional with the railroad company when they file there their plats and their corporate action. That the legislative power could ever have deemed a route of a road to be "definitely fixed" when such fixing was only a private purpose or fact in the minds of half a dozen unofficial individuals and a record of it made in no public office is little less than an absurdity. Nor will the claim that the survey and designation of the line upon the surface of the earth constitute notice to the world bear investigation. Although the line should be plainly marked and visible, the observer, as before indicated, has no means of knowing whether the line is experimental or permanent; no means of knowing whether it has been acted upon by the board of directors finally or not. But still further, there is nothing that defines how a route shall be designated upon the surface of the earth. No law, no rule of the Department, defines how the route of a railroad shall be designated upon the surface of the earth. If pegs are found driven into the ground the settler may or may not have reasonable means of believing they designate the route of a land-grant railroad. No law or regulation advises him that they are such. As matter of fact he would seldom see them if there, obscured as they are by grass or undergrowth, and never being of such a monumental character as naturally to attract attention. But again, if the order of a board of directors approving and establishing a surveyed line operates to consummate the grant and effect the appropriation of land, why would not the order of the board of directors fixing the line upon a certain route designated by section or meridian, or other fixed lines, without a survey equally establish and definitely fix the route? It is not claimed that the survey alone "definitely fixes" the route. It is the order of the board, under the theory claimed, that fixes the route. The survey only furnishes the data for the authoritative action of the corporations; but meridian or township lines are equally definite data. A direct line from A to B, or a line in such a direction for a given distance from A, would be equally definite and certain. The law does not say "definitely fixed by survey." Within the reason and necessary operation of the rule under consideration a board of railroad directors may sit in their office and "definitely fix," by resolution, the route of a road five hundred or a thousand miles distant without survey, without the pretense of notice to anybody or to the Government, and thereby appropriate lands and confiscate the entry and homes of the bona fide settlers and occupants.

It is obvious that an essential requisite to the taking effect of the grant is that the subject of it, the alternate sections of land, should be identified. But identified to whom, by whom, in what manner? No identification could be reasonable or complete that does not distinguish the granted lands from the body of the public domain. The grants are of alternate sections; the remaining or intermediate sections remain in the Government open to general sale, entry, and settlement. To give effect and operation to the grant the one must be distinguished from the other. The executive officers of the Government who are charged with the execution of the law and the sale and disposal of the public lands of which these granted alternate sections are a part must be able to distinguish the granted from the ungranted sections. Under the general laws for the settlement and sale of the public lands the Government offers them all for disposal to the general body of its adult citizens through its authorized officers and agents and at its own public land offices. It keeps at these offices records and plats which, upon the faith of the Government, show the lands which are and which are not thus offered by the Government to its citizens. Under these circumstances a private grant is made to private parties for private corporate purposes—a grant confessedly a float—and every consideration of reason and analogy and justice dictates that such float should be deemed to be localized only when its subject-matter is identified, distinguished, segregrated from the common body of which it is otherwise an inseparable portion.

The grant is of alternate sections, alternate to the line or route of the road. Doubtless, therefore, in the ordinary course of things the first step toward the "individualization" of the grant is a survey of the proposed route; the next natural step is the adoption or approval, by the proper corporate authority, of such proposed route by its own formal, corporate, recorded action. Can it reasonably be said that this is enough; that the grant which was before a float is now identified; that the action of a private board in the retiracy of its own chambers, wherever they choose to be, consummates the grant and withdraws the land from the natural operation of the general laws? If it be so; if the grant is then and thereby consummated; if the title to the granted alternate sections then vests in the company, it is vested forever. The granted land becomes the private, absolute property of the company, surrounded with all the shields and defenses with which legal adjudications and constitutional law protect and secure a private vested right. But so far the Government, the granting party, knows nothing of the act of the corporation. It goes on in the regular execution of the laws, disposing of these lands to settlers and purchasers. But if the theory is good it makes no difference to the railroad. They have got their title. As a private right it must be protected and ejectment will lie against every settler and purchaser subsequent to the private resolution of the board adopting its line. Nor is it material, under such a view and interpretation of the law of the case, that the company should ever communicate its action to the Secretary of the Interior or file a plat of its road in the General Land Office.

If the doctrine is good at all it is good for all the cases it may cover, and in all the circumstances that may attend it. The company may, if it choose, withhold its action and the knowledge of its route from the Government forever. Its title is vested; why should it trouble itself with the Government or with settlers on and purchasers of the public domain? In practice their maps and plat of route are in fact at some time filed in the Department of the Interior, but the doctrine under review does not require that for the protection of the grant, the vesting of the title; and if it be the case that the grant attaches upon the adoption of the route by the corporate authority, then there is no escape from the logical result that the title is irrevocably vested in the company, and it is a matter of no concern whether their action is communicated to the Government the next day, the next year, or not at all. A doctrine that leads to such results as this must be fallacious. A line of construction that thus leads to a necessary confusion and uncertainty of all rights and titles under the homestead and pre-emption laws, that drives from their homes thousands of settlers who have located and entered their lands in pursuance of law and in conformity with the existing regulations, that leaves the administrative officers of the Government without knowing or the means of knowing the lands appropriated to railroads and severed from the public domain, can never be sustained in the forum of logic and conscience unless the plain and definite words of the law imperatively lead to that conclusion. Happily no such inexorable necessity exists.

The fallacy of the doctrine I have been considering consists in the gratuitous assumption that the line or route of road is "definitely located" or "definitely fixed" by the private ex parte action of the board of directors alone, whereas the implication of the acts themselves, the necessities of their feasible execution, their practical operation in connection with the concurrently existing homestead and pre-emption laws, their comparison with other current legislation, lead conclusively to the view that "definitely fixed" embraces not only the idea of an actual location by the company, but a communication and designation of that route to the proper officers of the Government and their acceptance and approval of the plats of such road. It must be definitely fixed to the cognizance of the Government, to the cognizance of the public. In the language of the law the route of the road is to be "definitely fixed," not only fixed but fixed "definitely," that is, fixed beyond the capacity of change; for as long as the capability of change exists, the fixing the location is not definite, is not at an end certainly. Attorney-General Cushing said of these acts, "definitely fixed implies fixed without capacity of change." Now, it will not be denied that a board of directors might resolve to-day that a certain line should be the permanent route of a road, but such action would not necessarily be final; they may reconsider it to-morrow, and establish a different route the next day or the next week or at any other time. Until the control of the subject passes from their hands they may continually change, modify, and alter their route. It is not beyond their control, not passed from their power over it, until their corporate action adopting a definite route, with a plat or other appropriate designation of the route, is filed with the proper Department of the Government and found by its appropriate officers to be in compliance with and in execution of the law under which the grant is claimed. Then, and not before, the line of the road may be justly said to be definitely fixed. A line is thereby established in view of both parties to the grant, a route is established beyond the capacity of change; and as incident thereto for the first time the alternate sections granted become certain, definite, known, and individualized.

The late Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Jacob Thompson, seems to have been of this opinion. In giving a decision upon one of these land-grant acts he says:

> When only a preliminary survey has been made, pursuant to which the State proposes to show on a map the localities in which the route will fall, it is evident that the map must connect the route with the lines of the public surveys, showing the specific sections of land through which the road will be built, and thereby the exact line upon the earth on which the route will fall; otherwise the location is not "definite," nor is it thereby indicated precisely where the limits of the grant in place will fall. Even then we cannot regard a location on a map as "definitely fixing" the route till it is concluded that no subsequent act of the State or of the United States shall change that route; and this cannot be assumed by the grantor or the grantee until both are committed by their proper officers or agents to a recognition of one and the same line of location. (1 Lester's Land Laws, 587.)

When, therefore, the lines of route have been clearly designated by the proper corporate authority of the railroad company and the plats of the same showing their relation to the public surveys, together with the proper evidence of the due action of the company in adopting such route, have been deposited in the Department of the Interior and are found to be in compliance with the law and are approved, then for the first time can the route be deemed to be "definitely fixed;" and immediately upon that being ascertained the lands are withdrawn from other disposition by the Secretary of the Interior and secured to the company.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is a still further and most important consideration which conduces strongly to the correctness of the construction for which I contend. We have the definite enactment of a law of Congress affirming the right of every settler upon the public lands, before withdrawal for railroad purposes, to enter the same under pre-emption laws. I refer to the act of March 27, 1854, which is as follows:

> That every settler on public lands which have been, or may be, withdrawn from market in consequence of proposed railroads, and who had settled thereon prior to such withdrawal, shall be entitled to pre-emption, at the ordinary minimum, to the land settled on and cultivated by them: Provided, They shall prove up their rights by such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior and pay for the same before the day that may be fixed by the President's proclamation for the restoration of said lands to market. (Statutes at Large, volume 10, page 269.)

This act, sir, is still in force. It was passed in the early days of railroad land-grant legislation; it is prospective in its operation; in view of and subject to its provisions every land-grant act, save half a dozen, has been enacted. It clearly contemplates that lands granted for railroad purposes should be withdrawn from market, and that until such withdrawal the lands should remain subject to disposal under other existing laws. It is a familiar rule of interpretation that acts upon the same subject-matter, acts in pari materia, are to be construed with reference to each other and with a view to the preservation of all rights and the protection of all interests mutually involved and affected by the same.

The legal doctrine upon this subject is thus stated by a standard commentator upon statutory construction:

> The rule that statutes in pari materia are to be consulted for the construction of each other holds good though some of the statutes may have expired or even been repealed, and whether they are referred to or not. "All acts which relate to the same subject," said Lord Mansfield, "notwithstanding some of them may be expired or are not referred to, must be taken to be one system and construed consistently. (Sedgwick on Statutory and Constitutional Law, page 250.)

The application of this principle plainly leads to the conclusions I have advocated and to the adoption of that construction and that line of policy sought to be reinaugurated by the passage of the present bill.

Mr. Speaker, the interests involved in this subject are of vast magnitude and of most vital concern. All along the thousands of miles of land-grant railroads in the Mississippi Valley and westward to the Pacific, thousands of brave citizens have pitched their tents and builded their homes. Invited by what they believed to be beneficient laws, and by what they regarded as a paternal government, they ventured their all upon its faith, and now find themselves on the eve of being driven forth penniless from home and hearth-stone, the victims either of improvident enactment or mistaken execution of the laws. Their cries are coming up to us for relief, for justice. After spending years in the cultivation of lands and establishing homes acquired under the homestead law, and the time arriving when they are entitled to patents, instead of a patent they get a notice that their entries are canceled in favor of some railroad, and their homes delivered over to its remorseless grasp. I hold in my hand the letter of one of these sufferers, which I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> LINN COUNTY, KANSAS, December 27, 1873.
> SIR: Eighteen homesteads were recently canceled (as he calls it) by the Secretary of the Interior, mostly in Linn County, some in Anderson County. He has been doing the same thing for a year or so, but more by detail. The men in most of these cases have made good homes by years of toil, and now they are given to the railroad company. I need not say that if there is not redress had the deepest wrong is done. There is a deep feeling all over the country about this matter. A meeting was held at Mound City, at which resolutions were passed calling upon the Kansas Senators and Representatives to get us relief from Congress, and particularly upon you as our Representative from this district. We are powerless under this blow. Will you help us? The Department has done this, then turned on us a cold shoulder. Will you take hold of our case, or will you also turn us a cold shoulder? We are looking to you with the greatest anxiety.
> With the deepest respect, I remain yours,
>
> GEORGE W. SMITH,

> Hon. Judge LOWE.

Mr. LOWE. This, sir, is but a sample of hundreds of letters to members upon this floor invoking the shield of protective legislation. They come from those who have been faithful and good citizens in all the walks of life—from those who have upborne your flag in the hour of the country's trial. They come with a cause that appeals to the justice and to the good faith of the Government, to its honor and to its humanity.

If the relief sought by this bill is not furnished, if the demands of the railroads shall be acquiesced in and conceded, and these occupants under the homestead and pre-emption laws shall be driven from their lands by the strong arm of power, they will be found knocking at the doors of Congress for pecuniary indemnity, supported by a moral and legal equity which the justice of the country cannot afford to disregard. Having entered upon their lands upon the invitation of the Government, holding in their hands the evidence from Government officers of proper payment for the same and of their right to have their entries carried into patent, their claim to be made whole in some mode cannot be ignored; and to turn them away remediless is to shock every sentiment of natural justice and political morality. I hope this Congress will not fail to pass this bill, or some equivalent measure of justice and relief.

Mr. THOMAS, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, there is no subject so important to the American people, and about which we now hear so much, as our financial embarrassment. I am not going to-night to attempt to examine the cause of our national indebtedness but to look at the cause of our individual indebtedness. We know that we have a large national debt; that our counties, townships, corporations, and States in their corporate capacities are also largely indebted. It is to the individual indebtedness of our citizens that I desire to address my remarks to-night, and how that has come about, and what is the remedy for it.

The remedy for the national indebtedness we all know; it is to pay the interest upon the debt, to create a sinking fund for the extinguishment of the national debt as the bonds become due from year to year. Why have individuals become indebted? In my judgment the answer to that question is involved in the simple statement of what has occurred in the past. Since the war our currency has been more or less depreciated in value all the time. The value and purchasing power of our money has been less than what it was before the war. Consequently the same amount of labor, as represented by the money which is received as a compensation for it, does not represent the same amount of the comforts and luxuries of life as it did when currency was equal to specie in value. Not willing to curtail our luxuries, we have been constantly straining our credit so as to live up to our wants and the luxuries and comforts to which we were accustomed and which we enjoyed when the purchasing value of money was greatly more than it has been during the last ten years. As a people and individually we have fallen into debt.

Now, what is the remedy for this state of affairs? Is it in asking Congress to legislate upon the subject? Is it in agitating the question through the public press from one extremity of the nation to the other? Will that add one dollar to the pockets of a single individual in this Republic or enhance the value of his property one dollar? If we had passed every currency bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency in each House of the national Legislature, would we as a nation have been one dollar wealthier than we are now? I think the great mistake we are now making, and have been making since this Congress commenced, is that instead of directing the attention of our people to the true remedy for their indebtedness, we have taught them to look from themselves to the national Legislature as the source from which any remedy was to come. In my judgment in that we have made a sad mistake. By that mode we have broken down not only the theory of our Government, by looking to the national Congress as the source from which all comforts and blessings were to flow, but we have broken down the spirit of self-reliance and manly independence of our people, that determination to shoulder our debts and to work them out by honest industry that we ought to have inculcated upon our people.

When you now see a man in debt, instead of making up his mind like an honest man to curtail his expenses and to go to more active pursuits and industries, to economize in every conceivable mode his expenses and those of his family, to produce a greater amount of commodities to be exchanged for money, he is deluded by the idea that we are going to do something here by legislation to rectify the evils from which he is suffering. In my judgment in that is to be found an evil which is doing more damage to the country than all other causes combined.

If we had not agitated this question at all during this Congress, confidence would have been long since restored, money which seemed to be abundant twelve months ago, and which is still in the country, would have flowed into circulation, and would have extinguished debts just in proportion as confidence was restored. Suppose that we could become confident that money is settled and permanent in value, and not to be changed. I owe a debt to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY;] I pay it to him; he pays it over to a gentleman in his rear, and he to a third and a fourth, and it circulates in the community, and debts are extinguished, and nobody complains of financial pressure. But if I have it in my pocket and am waiting to see what Congress will do either to diminish or enhance its value, I will keep it there until Congress adjourns. If they have done anything or are likely to do anything to enhance the value of my money I would be very cautious about letting it go out. If I believe they would do something to depreciate its value I will wait to be sure of it before I part with it.

Should the time come when the people shall be satisfied that the value of money will not be changed, it will begin to circulate, and our people will soon find that relief is not to come from Congress, but from individual exertions, from economy, prudence, perseverance in honest pursuits, and the various developments of industry in civil life throughout this Republic.

I deprecate the idea of deluding our people with the hope that we can do something here to better their condition. What can we do? Can we by the most solemn act of legislation add one cent to the value of a dollar? Suppose we pass a bill by a unanimous vote, and it is sent to the President as soon as it is enrolled, and it is signed by him, can that add a dollar to the intrinsic value of the property of the Republic? What we want is a greater amount of productiveness in the Republic; what we want is more of commodities to exchange for money, and let the money stand at its fixed value; that in my judgment is what we want. Hard and difficult as the task may seem, uninviting as it may be to the people, that is the only true remedy, and to that must we come at last.

Sir, we are told on all hands that nothing should be done to pay the creditor more than the consideration he gave for his debt. I concede that is right, and I would not by any act of mine interfere to the extent of one cent with the amount of consideration he is to receive. Neither, on the other hand, would I by any legislation compel him to accept one cent less than the consideration he gave.

How, then, can we expect to legislate on the subject without disturbing more or less this great equilibrium which should be preserved inviolate between the rights of the debtors on the one hand and the rights of the creditors on the other?

Sir, we are told here, and I heard it from the distinguished gentleman on my left to-night, that the debtor community are largely in the majority. Admit that they are, what does that show? Does not that have some inkling of the fact that the majority should have the right to say what amount should be given in payment of honest debts? I care not if there were a thousand to one, that thousand has no right to say the creditor shall receive one single cent less in the payment of his debt than the honest consideration I gave for it. Number has nothing to do in disturbing the relations between the debtor and creditor. If millions were on one side and a single individual on the other, I would scorn to do one act that would enable that million to take a cent out of the pockets of an honest debtor by legislation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when we have ceased to talk about expanding the currency or contracting the currency, when we let it alone, be like a ship driven ashore during a storm, it will then soon right itself again. Trade will regain its wonted channels. Industry will begin to revive. It will be then seen that instead of looking to Washington for relief it will be better to look to the strong arms and strong nerves of the people to give relief in this financial crisis which has come upon us.

Sir, how can we expand the currency without diminishing its value? I have heard it frequently asserted on this floor during the last six weeks that when the entire property of the nation backs the currency, and is pledged for the redemption of our bonds and the payment of our currency, we could not depreciate the value of the currency by increasing it. We have lost sight of this fact, that though the value of the national property may be a thousand times that of the amount of currency afloat, to get money to pay that currency implies taxation; and just in proportion as it becomes necessary to increase taxation to redeem the currency do you diminish the chances that the tax to that amount will be levied.

And now, sir, I come to the other proposition, that the depreciation will be found in proportion as you augment the volume of the currency. Do we not see it now in those States where they are hesitating to levy the taxation necessary to meet the interest on their State debts? Why is this? Because it is more than 1 per cent. of the value of their property? No, sir; it is because you cannot get a Legislature that has the moral nerve to march up to the mark and levy the tax, go to their homes, and be held responsible to their constituents. And just in proportion as that difficulty exists, just to the same extent will the currency be depreciated. That is the measure, of doubt as to the Legislature, State or national, having moral courage to come up and levy the taxes to redeem the debt when it matures. That is the difficulty in the way. It is not because the property of the nation is not vastly more than is necessary to redeem the debt, but because you may not have a Congress in this and in the other end of the Capitol that will have the moral courage to raise the tax to redeem the debt when it falls due.

You know, Mr. Speaker, how difficult a thing that is to accomplish. That is the measure of the responsibility we have to incur, and that is the secret of how it happens that our money will depreciate in value just in proportion as we augment its quantity. I say, then, away with the idea that increasing the volume of our currency will not diminish its value.

Now, sir, how can we get to the specie standard? So long as we have upward of two thousand millions of debt requiring a large drain of specie on our resources, how can we get the money to redeem the debt as it falls due? The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means told us the other day that we would soon be in arrears; that there are some $29,000,000 now falling due and with no money on hand to meet it. Why, sir, is that? Because he along with the rest of us seems to have concluded that we could not afford to increase the taxes and go home and sustain ourselves before the people. When we are unwilling to levy taxes to raise twenty-nine or thirty million dollars more to meet our honest obligations, what do you suppose would be our condition if we swell the currency to a thousand millions, making it necessary that in due time we should bring the taxes up about double to redeem the national credit and keep up the national honor? are we likely to have a party here that will have moral strength and nerve to face the position, to impose taxation, to send out the collectors to gather it in, and expect to be sustained at home? No, sir; you cannot, in my humble judgment, and never will. And that is the rock upon which our finances are to split if we are ever wrecked in our financial operations in this country. That, Mr. Speaker, is the point to be guarded.

I know, sir, in speaking of these questions, when we see men around us hungering and anxious for measures which they suppose will relieve them from their financial distress, and we turn them away from us with the cold comfort we are now giving them, that it may depress and discourage them. But I hold it to be the true doctrine that when we speak to a man upon a question of grave importance like this it is the best course to deal with him candidly, honestly, and frankly. Let him know the truth, even if it is unpalatable to him; let him know it, and prepare to meet the emergency. That I hold to be the duty of the representatives of the American people; and that duty, sir, I intend as far as I can, by my voice and my vote, to discharge upon this floor. My people expect me to do it. I have been accustomed to deal honestly and frankly with them, teaching them to pay their debts as I endeavor to pay my own; and I will not teach them to expect that anything I can do here will pay their debts and legislate money in their pockets unless they are willing to give property or labor for it.

This much I have desired to say, Mr. Speaker, not that I expected to advance any new idea at all, but simply that I might give vent to some of the feelings I entertain on this subject as to what is the true remedy for all our financial disasters. When we have pursued this course, and when we shall have gone home and told our people these facts, they will see that we are dealing candidly with them. Then they will see prosperity come again, and the disasters that have overtaken them during the last six months will bring with them a warning against future disasters, and will be a blessing to them in disguise. In the end they will see that it is well that their extravagance has brought distress upon them; that they have had their attention pointed to the real remedy for all their ills, and they will live more circumspectly, more prudently, and more economically in the future; they will guard against vain and reckless speculation, and learn to live within their own means and to husband their resources. Then we will have financial means, financial credit, and we will cease to hear of money being scarce. That is all I desire to say.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. LAMPORT Mr. Speaker, I embrace this opportunity to express my approbation of the bill before the House, and give my reasons briefly for its approval; and lest I forget it I compliment my honorable friend from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] for his moral courage in introducing this bill, notwithstanding the antagonisms so palpably expressed by the action of the House against the Agricultural Department. I regard this bill a necessity to the life and perpetuity of this department. And I trust it will bring the question of life or death before the House to be disposed of on its merits, and either save the Agricultural Department with an honorable status, or wipe it out as unworthy of consideration by this Congress.

An act was passed and approved May 15, 1862, establishing at the seat of Government of the United States a Department of Agriculture, the general design and duties of which were to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture in the general and comprehensive sense of the word, and to procure and propagate and distribute among the people new and valuable plants and seeds. This enactment was hailed by the farmers of the country as a new era in the advancement of agriculture, and received their hearty commendation. The question can now be propounded with propriety, was this enactment a wise one? And did the interest of this, the greatest and most important American industry, justify the measure with necessary expenditure? I answer, yes. And to enforce my judgment I beg permission of the House to go somewhat into detail.

The Commissioner of Agriculture, in his report for 1872, says:

> The minds of men all over the world are constantly employed in the search after human knowledge in all that concerns the fruitfulness of the earth, as well as the philosophical principles which govern its mysterious operations; and it is the province of this department to mark well the progress that is made and keep its constituents advised of its value and how they may avail themselves of advantages to be gained, with its immense and almost measureless extent of this country as a field of agricultural employment. We must not fail to watch, learn, and carefully examine whatever may promise to add to the sum of human happiness, which springs from the carefully cultivated earth.
> When we call to remembrance the large proportion of the world's inhabitants who depend upon agricultural pursuits for their support in life, it gives us encouragement to believe that the work we do reaches further and strikes deeper into the interest of mankind than comes within the scope of any other human effort. It behooves this Government to be foremost in teaching those lessons of progressive, practical, and scientific agriculture in accordance with the measure of the great opportunities which we possess to learn them as they occur.

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that this department in its organization sought to impress on the public mind this axiom in political economy, that the smaller products of a diversified industry are far more than an equivalent for a single result of organized labor, however absorbing or important; hence the genius of this organization was to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture "in the general and comprehensive sense of the word." And herein is the reason for the universal demand for the report of the department, which is more generally read and appreciated than any document printed by Congress.

But, sir, can I maintain my assumption that the agricultural industries of this country are, and of right ought to be, estimated the most important and greatest?

Do not understand me as underrating the other great and important industries of the country; but great and vitally important as they are, they are in great part dependent on agriculture.

But, sir, to the facts and figures. I find by the census of 1870 that the farmers of this country have in use as improved lands 188,921,099 acres, valued in cash at $9,262,803,861. These lands were cultivated by machinery at a cost of $336,878,429. The total amount of wages paid during the year, including board, was $310,286,285.

The total products of cereals, (consisting of wheat, Indian corn, oats, rye, buckwheat, and barley,) in all the States and Territories of the United States, amounted in the year—

	Bushels.
1840 to	615,535,077
1850 to	867,454,032
1860 to	1,238,138,947
1870 to	1,357,230,096

The aggregate cereal product of all the nations of Europe in 1868, with a total population of 296,128,293, was reported to the international statistical congress at the Hague, in 1869, to be 4,754,516,604 bushels, being 16 bushels to the head. The product in the United States in 1870, of 1,357,230,096 bushels, with a population of 38,558,371, was 35 bushels to the head.

I will endeavor to impress the House more perfectly by bringing to your notice the amount and value of a few of those products that may be termed staples, for time would fail me to go into detail. The farmers of this country produced, as per census of 1870, 287,745,626 bushels of wheat, 760,944,540 bushels of Indian corn, 3,011,996 bales of cotton, 100,102,387 pounds of wool, 514,092,683 pounds of butter, 53,492,153 pounds of cheese, orchard products valued at to $47,335,189, market-garden products $20,719,229. But I must content myself in passing over the vast number and amount of items that go to make up the value and importance of this great industry. The question very properly arises how do these products directly affect the substantial interests of the country?

I invite your attention for a moment, while I attempt to solve this problem.

The export of agricultural products for the year ending June 30, 1873, are as follows: 39,204,285 bushels wheat, value $51,452,204; 2,562,086 barrels wheat flour, value $19,381,664; 38,541,930 bushels Indian corn, value $23,794,694; corn meal, value $1,474,827; 482,410 bushels barley, value $323,187; rye and rye flour, value $515,676; oats 714,072 bushels, value 290,575; 2,609,254 bales cotton, value $227,243,069, to which should be added a considerable amount of manufactured cotton.

You will observe I have omitted a large amount of products for fear I should weary the House.

But I have approximated my object, and have given you the figures of the few staple productions for the year 1870, and some of the products exported during the year ending June 30, 1873. Again, sir, this great industry affects the substantial interests of the country by not only producing bread, meat, and clothing, but it furnishes the basis of transportation. The honorable gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] in his speech on interstate commerce, declares from his standpoint that "the want of proper facilities to transport four hundred million bushels of grain is the main object sought;" but in addition to that five hundred thousand tons of pork have been packed in this locality during the last year, and as many tons of live hogs are moved easterly each year, and nearly all the surplus beef and mutton, 510,025 head of cattle and 145,016 head of sheep having been shipped by rail from Chicago during the year ending June 30, 1873. Again, sir, the vast amount of agricultural products necessitates the employment and support of thousands of men termed dealers and middle-men. These products become the great commodities of commerce; in fact railroads, rivers, lakes, canals, and the ocean are dependencies on the productions of the farmer.

These statements, which are very meager, show something of the real and substantial acquisitions of the country. Commerce an trade, invaluable in themselves, are in fact ideal; exchange of commodities is not an acquisition in fact; money passing from one man's pocket to another's is not a real accumulation, but agricultural products are real, substantial accumulations. "Grain," says Adam Smith, "is the regulating commodity by which all commodities are fairly measured and determined." How impressive this principle of political economy as developed in the late panic. Panics are the financial epidemics that test the financial ability of men. They challenge confidence, and not unfrequently shake financial marts to their very center. During the late panic it was reported that in Wall street, New York, which is reputed to be the great financial ménagerie, where bulls and bears hold undisputed sway, not unfrequently the paper of the great railroad king, who is estimated to be worth from fifty to one hundred million dollars, was hawked about the streets with strong collaterals without negotiation. Trust companies, bankers, brokers, and money-shavers were in a perfect frenzy; a dark and portentous cloud seemed to lower over the whole country; a financial paralysis was the result. Then commenced that fearful process, shrinkage, and fortunes withered as new-mown grass before the noonday sun. It was said by my honorable colleague, [Mr. MERRIAM,] in his speech on banking and currency, that a millionaire of New Jersey "disclaiming forever his vast possessions, assumed the attitude of injured innocence exiled from his hard-earned many millions, stood before us a confessed pauper," a victim of the panic. What avail then were bank balances, bonds, stocks, promises to pay?

But, sir, there was a silver lining to that fearful cloud. The granges who hold the granaries of the world came to the rescue; they threw their granary-doors open; British gold came to us by the million. For what? For bread. The agricultural products of the country were then appreciated; the balance of trade began to turn in our favor. Grain was indeed a reality; confidence founded on real balances began to return; the panic was appeased, the country was saved—and by what? By agricultural products. And but for this reality our country might now be humiliated in bankruptcy. Sir, agriculturists ask no gratuity; but ought not the Congress of this great nation to manifest some considerations of respect and interest, and be willing to foster this great industry upon which the country depends so much? And yet, sir, when the representatives of the farmer ask the mere pittance of a report containing valuable information, stimulating industry and advising economy and frugality, gentlemen array themselves in all their powers of "tutored" eloquence, and lift their hands in holy horror at the awful prodigality of the friends of the farmer who propose to print and distribute two hundred and fifty thousand copies of the report on agriculture at the expense of the Government.

I was amused and interested by the remarks of the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. PHELPS,] who caught this anti-agricultural spirit of enonomy and made this notable declaration as the prelude to his deliverance, which was uttered with tutored eloquence.

He says: "I believe that a privilege for the few is an injustice to the many." This was wondrous strange to me, a declaration that demands qualification; for in its literal application it contravenes the great principles of charity and Christian benevolence. The American Government recognizes no such contracted principle of faction, but, on the contrary, its very genius is to obtain that best of all evidence of a good government, the comfort, the happiness, the thrift of the masses, even at the apparent expense of the favored few, and the result of such action has been munificent, but not unjust.

But who did the gentleman mean by the few and who by the many? By the census of 1870 we have 5,863,707 farmers, planters, and agricultural laborers. I understand that farmers constitute three-fourths of the voters, and by far the largest number of the tax-payers of the country. I notice a statement in the Bulletin in which Iowa is reported to have 60.07 per cent. farmers; Kansas, 59 per cent.; Minnesota, 56.65 per cent.; Wisconsin, 54.53 per cent.; Nebraska, 52.73 per cent.; Missouri, 52.20 per cent.; Illinois, 50.32 per cent.; Michigan, 46.39 per cent.; New York, 25 per cent.; Pennsylvania, 24.03 per cent.; Connecticut, 22.56 per cent., and the manufacturing States generally less.

But, sir, I make great allowance for this masterly effort of the gentleman as touching this "ghost" that so haunts him—two hundred and fifty thousand copies of the Agricultural Report to be given to the farmers of the country! That would be a tax per capita of say five mills. Was it strange that this ghost would not down at his bidding? He said, "not twenty-five hundred, not five thousand, but two hundred and fifty thousand!" His mind was greatly exercised; shocking enough to wake up any millionaire of the country. Not only was he horrified, but he expressed his admiration of the "audacity" of the gentleman from Iowa who reported the resolution to print. Audacious wretch! And he calls up his "indefatigable friend" from Maine for his infidelity to economy. Surely he has not been delinquent. And more; he arraigns the "father of the House," because he "utterly refused to prophesy." But mark, he lifts the cloud from the brow of the "brave and eloquent" gentleman from New York, my distinguished colleague, [Mr. WOODFORD,] much to my delight. But now he apprehends the "inexplicable decision;" it was the grangers; and he serves up a delectable dish to the grangers of New Jersey. He says: "Who wants the franking privilege? I pause for reply. The grangers want it. I am not a granger; I do not want to give them what they want. I say it very boldly. I do not like granger principles."

Sir, that settles the question between the gentleman and the grangers of New Jersey, and I understand there are not a few in that State. But henceforth there will not be found a granger in that State so poor as to do him reverence.

But what are the principles of the grangers, that so nauseate and disgust the gentleman? It is due the grangers, that are so roughly handled, to inquire; therefore, I read from their platform, to wit:

> To develop a better and higher manhood and womanhood among ourselves; to enhance the comforts and attractions of our homes and strengthen our attachment to our pursuits; to foster mutual understanding and co-operation; to maintain inviolate our laws, and to emulate each other in labor; to diversify our crops, and crop no more than we can cultivate; to systematize our work and calculate intelligently on probabilities; to discountenance the credit system, the fashion system, and every other system tending to prodigality and bankruptcy.

What awful declarations! How they grate on the ear of the highly cultivated and sensitive mind!

Mr. Speaker, these are the avowed principles that brought the honorable gentleman to his feet to "boldly" express his disgust. But, sir, I differ with the gentleman, and with "untutored" eloquence shall approve, advocate, and sustain this platform as worthy of all commendation. I know nothing of the detail of this organization, but, coming from the farm and expecting to return to it, these declarations meet my hearty approval; and for their furtherance I ask this House to pass the bill under consideration, as conducive to the advancement and success of the greatest and most important industry in the country. I deprecate the necessity that justifies organizations whose province it is to foster special industries; but, sir, the necessity seems to have arisen when the farmers of this country are called upon to protect themselves.

There is manifestly a disposition in this Congress to undervalue the importance of agriculture. As I have said before, forty-three gentlemen of the House have put themselves on record in favor of a resolution, "without unnecessary delay to wind up, discontinue, and abolish the Department of Agriculture by the 1st day of July, 1875." This was frank, open, and manly; far more so, in my estimation, than to withold the printing and prevent the free distribution of reports, seeds, &c., which is the peculiar province of this department, and without which it becomes valueless. The genius of this Government permits no such stinted measure. Education, commerce, manufactures, railroads, mining, and internal improvements generally have received liberally of the Government. What has been the result? These aids "to the few have not proven an injustice to the many," but have resulted in developments and successes that make ours the noblest, the freest, and the best Government on earth, and if continued will yet crown us the almoners of the civilized world. Shall the agriculturist be ignored? I trust not. Let us have an Executive Department of Agriculture and Industry; bring into that Department all kindred interests—public lands, labor in its relation to education and capital, transportation of agricultural products, economic plants, preservation of timber, prevention of cruelty to animals, fish culture, and the many interests appropriately connected therewith. But, sir, I must hope against hope, unless there comes a change over not a few who now grace the Halls of Congress.

Sir, I think the farmers of this country have reason to complain. I have been not a little exercised in my mind on this subject. I charged the honorable gentleman from Indiana some days since with expressions of low estimate of the Agricultural Department by declaring an improvement to the building as unworthy and as a matter of "mere fancy." I will do him no injustice. He did favor agriculture. So does the honorable gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] and also the gentleman from New Jersey. But it is to favor agriculture as it has been rather than as it is and ought to be. It is in fact to honor us as worthy to labor and toil, and feed on hog and hominy. But when we assert that we are entitled to a place in the great army of progression; when we seek to make our homes cheerful and happy by the inspiration of the exquisite productions of nature, surrounding our homes with the beautiful flowers so refining and elevating, and desire to enable our wives and daughters to meet us, as we come from the field tired and toil-worn, with the beautiful smiles of heaven, the exquisite flowers to mingle with their smiles, the gentleman from Indiana cries out mere fancy! the gentleman from Iowa curls his lip and talks of morning-glories! and the gentleman from New Jersey goes into fits! And herein is the justice and burden of our complaints, it is the low estimate put upon our high vocation. Sir, if there is a man in the land entitled to the comforts, the pleasures, the luxuries of "sweet home," it is the farmer. If any ladies in the land are entitled to the enjoyment of the exquisite blandishments of home, it is the wives and daughters of the farmer. If there are young men in the land that the Government is more interested in than others, they are the sons of the farmers of America, born, reared, and employed in that vocation that points directly and constantly up to Him whose munificent benefactions lead them to a living faith in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. For surely "the laborer is worthy of his hire."

Sir, I have sometimes felt humiliated. An ex-member of Congress from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] openly stigmatized the Commissioner of Agriculture on this floor as a petty peculator, pilfering vegetables from the public gardens for his own table. The honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] so noted for his pleasantry—and no one enjoys it more than I do—caricatured the whole fraternity of farmers and convulsed the House with laughter by holding up a woodcut of a choice breeding-sow from Maryland or Pennsylvania, when at the same time, probably, the gentleman's stomach was digesting a choice bit of bacon brought to market by some enterprising farmer. But so far as this gentleman is concerned I ought not to complain, for the farmers of the State of New York settled the account with the gentleman last November much to their gratification if not to his satisfaction. His effort proved to be what the gentleman would call a political "boomerang."

The last Congress refused to print the Agricultural Report, notwithstanding it was prepared at great cost and labor. The present Congress refuses to distribute the report, and therefore there is no propriety in printing. For some unknown reason to me, communications from members of Congress were published in the papers before the convening of the present session, charging that the printing and distributing of the Agricultural Report would be gross prodigality. I read nothing about the cost of the Medical and Surgical History of the War, and other valuable documents; and I do not make this mention because I am opposed to the printing and distribution of these valuable documents, for I am in favor of the Government printing and distributing reports and scientific works that cannot be so well obtained otherwise, and which may prove a public benefit.

But, sir, I must close my remarks. I only regret my inability to do justice to the farmers of the country in presenting the claims of agriculture, which need not shrink from comparison with any other industry in the country. The farmers as a class must be regarded as the great conservative political power of the nation; no communes, no mobocrats, no strikers, no corner-jobbers, or Black-Friday miscreants are to be found among the farmers. Sir, elevate the agriculturists of the country, and you contribute to the country's safety, to its patriotism, to its stability, to its honor. In conclusion, I quote a few words from the pen of an able writer, which I commend for consideration:
